Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Consent is important but it is not sufficient to validate a marriage.

A marriage is not a private bi-partisan arrangement between two persons.

It is a public commitment which deserves social support for the good of our whole society.

Thus it cannot be privatised or personalised in toto.

Public declarations (or vows) of lifelong fidelity in public are valuable to the couple and to family and observers - as a sign that marriage - and a new family (to which marriage should normally be a precursor) is an important public marker

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Reality shows have gone to astonishing lengths as the incubators of negative self-exposure.

One can foresee ridiculous locations and ceremonies being proposed by zany couples with the help of a cooperative officiant.

Since marriages are part of the cement of a civil, civic, and civilised society, there should be a basic minimum of common words and practices for every marriage

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is desirable that marriages should be publicly verified and validated.
They should have a certain dignity and self-restraint about them (there is plenty of space and time for parties afterwards).
It is therefore desirable that certain prescribed locations should be defined.
Of course they should be dignified and safe - but this should not be left to the participants' judgement.

Please share your views below:

No - suitable locations do not include outdoors, lakes, rivers, in the air...
And because marriage is a public affair it should be held in a public location.

No

Please expand on your answer:

if, as seems likely, the number of officiants is to be significantly increased, it is NOT desirable that the suitability of locations should be left to their judgement.

Consultation Question 52:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A church, synagogue, temple, registry office are public buildings, used by tradition for solemn and important ceremonies - of which marriage is one.
The suitability of a location should not be left to the officiant's private judgement.
The meaning of "safe" I think is clear.
It seems that the meaning of "dignified" needs to be clarified; and the normal meaning of the word needs to be carefully maintained.

There also needs to be a requirement that the actual content of the ceremony itself be 'dignified and solemn'. And of course there needs to be a written standard and definition of what is meant by 'dignity' and 'solemnity' in order to make sure these tests are met.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

In order to support the previous question of solemnity and dignity, there should be a draft guideline in place for a minimum requirement to be met. But that its not too strict so that it impairs the ability for weddings to be tailored and made specific for the couple.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Its far to broad to allow people to be married without even being present at the ceremony. And being able to say anything they like or nothing at all to count as 'consent' is also far too broad. As mentioned in previous answers there needs to be a minimum, set format and words used as standard to be legally married. This is appropriate for the lifetime commitment that they ae entering into and goes with the solemnity and dignity of the occasion.

This is how it is at the moment and there is already a large amount of flexibility allowed within a ceremony to enable couples to make the day special to them.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Again I go back to the seriousness of a marriage ceremony. The law in our nation is a serious standard in all areas of life and we expect certain tenets to be met and kept. For instance, we expect judges, barristers, legal professionals, juries and defendants to all keep to a certain standard and code when in a court of law. This is entirely appropriate for significant events and necessary for society.

And the same applies for a wedding which is a public declaration - society and the state have an interest in it. As do the couple's families - it's not all about the bride and groom.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Forced marriage is still an issue in society and the open doors requirement was introduced hundreds of years ago to help stop forced marriage. It needs to kept that way and it also helps retain that marriage is a public declaration - not something that happens secretly being closed doors.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Going back to previous answers - this revolves around dignity and solemnity.

A tree house as a wedding ceremony venue for example is not suitable for a such a significant event! Or a fast food restaurant - in fact an unofficial wedding ceremony has already taken place at a Comic Book convention with a couple dressed as comic book heroes. (Not to mention S&M Dungeons) It would be completely incompatible with the dignity of marriage for venues like these to host legal weddings.

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Both parties must be present and give their consent orally and in front of witnesses using a specific ceremonial formulated statement with prescribed wording. Anything else undermines the solemnity and dignity of the wedding ceremony and denies the seriousness of the commitment being made.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The seriousness of commitment , as well as the dignity and solemnity of the wedding ceremony is wholly undermined by a "pick and choose" approach allowing the parties to insert any frivolity they wish. A wedding is a public statement of a serious commitment to an important building block of society and so an approved format of ceremony should be used.

I agree with the proposed duty, but it does not go far enough. Officiants should have a wider responsibility to ensure that the content and tone of the legal ceremony upholds the dignity and solemnity of marriage. The proposals need to define what is meant by 'dignity' and 'solemnity'. The consultation seems to view ceremonies taking place "in the air" as being compatible with these tests, which suggests they are easy standards to reach.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It should not be possible for someone to get married without being present at the wedding ceremony.

Simply signing the marriage schedule is inadequate. Couples would be able to say anything they like or nothing at all. This is a major departure from the public declarations always considered foundational to the legal marriage ceremony.

This risks undermining the solemnity of the wedding ceremony and denying the seriousness of the commitment being made. There is already a large amount of flexibility in the wedding ceremony. The prescribed words are minimal and couples can add to them in all sorts of ways. It is not very much to ask that some specific phrases are used to show that both people freely consent to the lifetime commitment they are entering into. The idea that a couple should be able to completely personalise their ceremony comes from a wrong view of marriage. A wedding is not just about the couple. The couple enter into a union which is understood by society and has been legally defined. So society and the law have an interest in the making of a public declaration. The logic of a wholly self-defined marriage ceremony is for marriage to be decoupled from the law and wider society. Marriage would become an entirely private matter, rather like a personal hobby.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I reiterate the seriousness and solemnity of a marriage ceremony. A particular ceremony should not just be allowed because the couple wants it, but because it is appropriate for such a significant event. The idea that a couple should be able to choose everything about a wedding ceremony comes from a wrong view of marriage. A wedding is a public declaration in which society and the state have an interest. Unofficial wedding ceremonies have included themes such as Alice in Wonderland, James Bond, Lord of the Rings, Game of Thrones, Marvel comics, Beauty and the Beast, Harry Potter, Star Wars and Flash Gordon. One had a 'Woodland Fairy themed ceremony with ponies dressed as unicorns' while another couple dressed as hedgehogs. It is very doubtful that many of these reflected how seriously marriage should be taken.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The “open doors” requirement helps convey the public nature of wedding declarations.

The open doors requirement was introduced hundreds of years ago as a protection against forced marriage. This is still a problem in our society. Removing the requirement encourages a false perception that marriage is a private matter without any public significance.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I reiterate the seriousness and solemnity of a marriage ceremony. Venues should not simply be allowed because marrying couples want them, but because they are appropriate places to hold such a significant ceremony. There are some specific benefits in a wider variety of venues being allowed (for example churches who do not own their own building), but you should express caution that this should not legitimise inappropriate settings. Question 48 specifically asks about couples having ceremonies “in the air”, meaning the safe and dignified test doesn’t seem too hard to meet. Would weddings also be allowed in McDonald’s? Unofficial wedding ceremonies have taken place in an S&M dungeon, underwater, and at a Comic Book convention with a couple dressed as comic book heroes. It would be completely incompatible with the dignity of marriage for venues like these to host legal weddings.

This proposal does not go far enough. Upholding the dignity and solemnity of marriage should not just be the responsibility of the officiant but also of all those having anything to do with the content and the tone of the ceremony. Marriage is the most important event in any couple's life and the wedding should always be conducted with the greatest reverence and solemnity.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The consent for marriage must be clearly expressed orally in public by both parties and they should both confirm that there is no impediment to them marrying each other. A subsequent written declaration should simply confirm the public oral statements.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A wedding should take place only in a form and ceremony reflecting the dignity and solemnity of the occasion and using words traditionally used and familiar to the public.

Consultation Question 44:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Anglican, Jewish or Quaker weddings should be permissible so long as they reflect the dignity and solemnity of marriage and emphasise its permanence .

Consultation Question 45:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Religious content should be permitted so long as the dignity and solemnity of the civil ceremony is preserved. If there is significant religious content, then the couple should be asked why a full religious ceremony should be used instead.

Please share your views below:

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A religious service should be permitted and possibly desirable but the question should be asked why the civil ceremony was used anyway.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A wedding should always be a public occasion reflecting the fact that a marriage is an official legal contract and a public declaration is essential. The "Open doors" requirement was originally introduced as a protection against forced marriage, which is still a problem in society.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The location for a wedding should only be one in which the dignity and solemnity of the ceremony can be preserved and emphasised.

Please share your views below:

Weddings should only take place in buildings or locations officially recognised as appropriate and reflecting the dignity and solemnity of the occasion. On the air, on water or in private homes would not meet these criteria.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If a civil wedding location is officially designated as appropriate for the solemnisation of civil marriages, then the ceremony should always be publicly accessible.

Consultation Question 50:

Yes

Yes

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Religious weddings should take place in religious locations. Civil weddings should take place in civil locations.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The decision as to whether a location is appropriate is too important to be the responsibility of a single individual.

Consultation Question 52:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Of course, an officiant should always refuse to preside at a wedding that is not felt to be safe or dignified enough. However, the officiant's opinion is not enough. Any location for a wedding must be capable of reflecting the dignity and solemnity of the occasion and if it is inappropriate then it should not have been designated as a wedding venue in the first place.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

If an officiant is incapable of assessing whether a location is appropriate for a solemn and dignified wedding, then he or she should not be an officiant.

Consultation Question 53:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

There should be an approval process for wedding locations but approval should not be "optional".

Please share your views below:

The General Register Office should approve locations for civil weddings and the religious authorities should be responsible for religious wedding locations.

Chapter 8: Registration

Your proposals do not give sufficient weight to the dignity and solemnity of a wedding ceremony, reflecting the importance and desirability of marriage, which is the best decision that any couple can take in the course of their lives.

Chapter 1: Introduction

Consultation Question 1:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I find this question hard to answer. We had both a Humanist ceremony and a register office ceremony, because we were obliged to because we wanted to be legally married. This was a huge imposition, requiring us to make a 200 mile round trip to do the "legal wedding", which we did with only a handful of people. Our Humanist wedding was about a week later, with 100 people there and was absolutely our REAL wedding. It was meaningful, tailored, and in a place which was important to us.

I was not a Humanist celebrant at the time, and did not realise how important it was to find out what would be in the register office wedding. I cant remember the detail, because it was a long time ago, but I was quite shocked by some of the text. I have since been told stories by some of my couples of other unexpected elements in register office weddings - for one couple, they unexpectedly read a poem. Now, it turned out that this was one of the poems that they had chosen for their Humanist ceremony, to be read by the person who introduced them, and they felt this was undervalued by it being read (badly) by the registrar.

I have had the pleasure of doing one legal wedding, in Scotland, and I must say that it felt fantastic to bring these 2 elements together.

When I am working with a couple, I always explain the issues about legality, timing etc. I always seem to have to explain that they can do the legal bit, if that's what they want, at any time before or after their Humanist weddings, as I have come across many examples of registrars saying they have to do the wedding with them first. In addition, very few Councils make the cheap, statutory option clear on their website, and they offer only a ridiculously small number. So for instance a couple whose Humanist ceremony I conducted in August this year could not get an appointment for the statutory option till October.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Well, as it happened we were already legally married, so this is not really applicable.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

As explained above, we did also have a legally binding wedding, but your initial question does not throw up "both" as an option.

As far as my work as a Humanist celebrant is concerned, the majority of the couples I work with do chose also to have a civil marriage. But they have chosen a Humanist Ceremony because it matched their beliefs and values, and want a celebrant who also shares their beliefs and values, somewhere meaningful to them. At present it is impossible to have a legal wedding in England which meets these criteria. They don't want to do the civil marriage too, but they are forced to to get legal recognition.

There are many couples who have only a civil marriage but would prefer to have a humanist marriage, if they were legally recognised. They can't afford to have both (bearing in mind my earlier point about the cheap statutory ceremonies, these are often not easily available.) The growth in Humanist ceremonies in Scotland demonstrates this.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

n/a in my case, since we opted for legal marriage too.

Consultation Question 2:

Please share your views below:

Humanism is a recognised belief in the same way as Christianity, Quakers and Jews are recognised beliefs. Yet unlike these, Humanist couples can't have a legal wedding conducted by someone who shares their belief. There is no Humanist content in civil ceremonies, any more than there is religious content. Civil ceremonies are simply secular, not Humanist. And the importance of significant places cannot be overlooked. Being able to get married in the garden of a much loved family home, or perhaps in woodland, or on a beach, is a wonderful thing but at present not legal.

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

While obviously the priority has been to keep people safe, the often-changing regulations, which have caused problems for everyone planning a wedding in 2021, are compounded for Humanist couples because most of them will have had to plan 2 ceremonies, one civil, one Humanist. This means that 2 ceremonies, not 1, have had to be rearranged. Of my original 2020 bookings, all were postponed or in one sad case cancelled completely. The one wedding I did conduct in 2020 was however a great example of a Humanist ceremony at its best. The couple were deeply committed to the environment, and to craft ales and ciders, and they found a lovely space in a cider orchard, which also offered glamping so the wedding party could stay overnight. The bride's family were in the States or in Europe so unable to travel, and so we had about 20 guests physically present, and another 15 or so joining from wherever they were on Zoom. Thanks to some good technical wizardry, the tablet they were on was linked up to decent speakers, so several of them were able to contribute readings, as well as seeing everything that happened. It was a beautiful ceremony, with the couple's 3 children playing an active part, and celebrated the blending of the two families as well as the wedding of the couple.

Looking forward to next year, I am advising couples to think in terms of a venue which is under their control, like a family garden, so that they do not have the problems of cancelling and rescheduling a formal venue, if it should come to that.

Consultation Question 22:

Consultation Question 23:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This is a move in the right direction. The status of marriages should not depend on the buildings in which they take place, as it discriminates against people who don't have places of worship. Nomination by suitably recognised belief organisations like religious bodies and organisations is far more appropriate.

Consultation Question 24:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The law should simply refer to those beliefs that are relevantly protected under Article 9 of the European Convention on Human Rights – as these, after all, are the beliefs that the UK has a legal duty to extend recognition to. The approved organisations should have as their main function the advancement of their belief system - otherwise there is a danger that bogus organisations will spring up which are effectively commercial organisations pretending to be belief organisations. Organisations need to be committed to beliefs which are appropriate in a democratic society, mindful of the human rights of others, and in line with the Equality Act of 2010.

The use of "secular" is confusing in this context and does not provide an effective definition. Gardening societies and chess clubs are (usually) secular, but we would not support them performing marriages. Better to stick to "religion and belief" organisations as the defining quality.

I therefore support the Humanists UK proposed formulation: 'non-religious beliefs that attain the necessary level of cogency, seriousness, cohesion, and importance to attract protection under the Convention Rights and, further, are worthy of respect in a democratic society, are compatible with human dignity, and do not conflict with the fundamental rights of others'

Please share your views below:

Surely it would be better to have a strong definition of what DOES making to a non-religious belief organisation? If new beliefs or philosophies emerge in the future they can then be measured against this definition.

Consultation Question 25:

No

Please expand on your answer:

20 members is far too low a number. It would allow, for example, individuals who has been rejected by training providers, or who did not wish to train, and were only interested in providing weddings for their own financial gain, to make common cause with other such individuals and brand themselves with a title which implied that they were aligned with a religion or belief organisation.

It might be desirable for a small number of people who meet regularly for worship or in furtherance of their beliefs to be used as a criterion for licensing certain buildings, but for national accreditation a much higher bar needs to be set, including being an organisation which has been going for a certain length or time, having a certain number of supporters (preferably in the 1000s), having a registered office, perhaps being a registered charity even - there are many potential requirements that could be put in place, and there are models which already exist in other countries.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

I'd agree with unlawful as a criterion, but "contrary to public policy or morality" is far too broad and lays the marriage process open to political manipulation.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

No views. Humanists UK celebrants are all subject to rigorous training and peer review, therefore only nominating named individuals would apply.

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

With the proposed widening of the role of registrars, so that ceremonies can be conducted in unregistered locations, and with more flexible content, I can not see why this should be necessary. Commercial officiants who are neither registrars, nor working with a religious or belief organisation, would commercialise the market and add nothing to what is proposed. This model does not exist anywhere in Europe outside the channel islands, and could lead to a Las Vegas type approach to marriage, lacking in all dignity and significance. Already we are aware of commercial celebrants who claim to conduct "humanist" or "religious" ceremonies, without any training, and without holding appropriate beliefs. Couples who are deceived by these claims run the risk of having a substandard ceremony on their special day. The regulation of this would place a huge burden on the Registrar General - presumably it would be necessary to check paperwork, to require regular review, and indeed to have celebrants observed?

Consultation Question 30:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I agree with this in principle, but also think that the Registrar General should be able to refuse to register nominated celebrants if they do not consider them to be "fit and proper".

Consultation Question 31:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

If commercial celebrants were allowed to conduct legal ceremonies, yes all this would be necessary. But the operation of such a scheme would be cumbersome and expensive. Who would provide the training, and how would that be validated? How would the CPD be provided? We do all this as Humanists UK, of course, but we rely on having a training programme which has been developed over years, and on our network of celebrants to provide peer reviews etc. You would be creating a whole new industry here!

Consultation Question 32:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Humanists UK celebrants currently operate under this system in Northern Ireland and so do Humanist Society Scotland (HSS) celebrants in Scotland. It works well and does not prevent the celebrants from charging a reasonable fee for their work, reflecting the time and effort put into crafting a humanist ceremony, but does stop profiteering, including people charging exorbitant fees or trying to profit off ancillary activities by exploiting their position as officiants.

Humanist ceremonies involve much more work than those provided by registrars or most religious organisation. In all those cases, there is a set ceremony which may or may not be varied and personalised to some degree. This is not true of humanist ceremonies. Every one is written from scratch, and may require several meetings with the couple, and a great deal of research to provide all the elements needed.

In addition, as the cost of living varies around the country, so does what we charge for ceremonies.

For these reasons, GUIDANCE on fee levels has proved useful in Scotland I believe, but a set fee band would be most unhelpful.

Consultation Question 33:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I don't think that commercial celebrants should be able to do legal marriages, so don't agree. However, if they did, allowing them to make unlimited profits can only be good for them, and bad for couples.

Consultation Question 34:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

And this for me is at the heart of the matter. A phrase I often use in ceremonies is: "One of the most important choices we can make in life is to marry. It is the closest of partnerships and the most significant of contracts. By entering into the state of marriage we are creating one of those small building blocks of which society is made up."

Consultation Question 36:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes as long as it is not too prescriptive. The couple should be able to dictate the nature of the ceremony, as long as it is consistent with dignity and legality.

Consultation Question 38:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Humanists UK are rigorous in selecting people for training, and have robust systems for full accreditation and peer review. It is therefore unlikely that the General Register Office would have to take this action with Humanist celebrants.

Consultation Question 39:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

No, because I don't believe commercial celebrants should be able to perform legal marriages.

Consultation Question 40:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 41:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Again, this simply demonstrates the amount of administration that would be necessary if commercial celebrants are able to carry out legal marriages. How would this compliance be monitored and enforced? Again, Humanists UK have robust systems for this, starting with the requirement that celebrants regularly report on the CPD they have done, by providing an annual celebrant conference and regional and local CPD opportunities, and refresher courses for celebrants who trained some time ago. This requires a great deal of both paid and voluntary activity.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, though in respect of point 2, I assume the recommendation is not that every detail of every ceremony is submitted. Every Humanist ceremony is different, so I assume "submitting details" relates to a general approach to the moment of marriage.

Consultation Question 44:

Consultation Question 45:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This proposal is too loosely drawn. It does not properly consider what is significant about civil, religious, and humanist ceremonies, or the proper role of the state in providing marriages.

The state should not be able to include religion or belief in its ceremonies, as this might be seen as "establishing" or endorsing that religion and belief. A civil marriage should be uniquely available for those who do not feel strongly about religion or belief.

However, there is a distinction between an inclusion which represents an Act of Worship (such as the celebrant saying the Lord's Prayer) and the inclusion of some kind of religious reference because it's important to the couple in context. The Humanists UK's practice note on religion in humanist ceremonies specifies that 'Our ceremonies are non-religious but we recognise that there are aspects of religious reference embedded in our culture and day-to-day experiences. For example, certain hymns can remind people of their youth or even of their favourite rugby team. We are happy to include this sort of content where it helps to reflect the [parties], but not as an act of worship.'. There is no reason why civil ceremonies should not take a similar approach.

We are already concerned about the "mix and match" approach adopted by commercial celebrants who claim to mix in a bit of religion or belief, without themselves having that belief or being trained in the implications. This could be further encouraged by the approach suggested.

Please share your views below:

As above. If the couple want to include such content, they should be able to explain the context, and it should not in any way be an act of worship. A skilled officiant should be able to give appropriate advice. For instance, if a couple said to me that they had a religious relative who wanted to do a reading, I would suggest that they look at 1 Corinthians 13:1, which, although it comes from the bible, speaks of love rather than a god.

Consultation Question 46:

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 47:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Given that many Humanist ceremonies are conducted in private homes, as the place most significant to the couple, this would be difficult to maintain without putting property and privacy at risk.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

(though with some caveats below, and excluding any groups who are licenced only to perform ceremonies in a particular building.

This is particularly important to us as Humanist celebrants, as every aspect of the ceremony should be meaningful to the couple. Although I do perform some ceremonies in formal wedding venues, like hotels and stately homes, probably the majority are in places which are particularly meaningful to the couple, and are often not licensed venues. So, for instance:

- * Family homes and gardens, sometimes with a bitter-sweet element of also remembering a family member who has died

- * The place where the proposal happened

- * At one of the couple's business premises (I did a very remarkable one at a dressage centre, and another in a field behind a reclamation business, with the guests sitting on a vast assembly of chairs from the business.

- * In a place which is relevant to the couple's hobbies and interests (a nature reserve, a cider orchard etc.)

These choices add greatly to the significance of the event.

Please share your views below:

The point for humanist celebrants is that the venue should be meaningful. Examples 2 and 3 would be unusual, but certainly not impossible, were the couple for example people who worked on the water or in the air. There might be health and safety considerations to be taken into account, but then I prepare a risk assessment for all my ceremonies anyway, since there can be hazards associated with anywhere that is being used for a new purpose. For me, though, it must be possible to maintain the dignity of the event, so the setting needs to be relatively quiet and private at the time of the ceremony. This is not always guaranteed in registered venues - I have ceremonies almost ruined by clattering and banging from the kitchen in a pub venue, for instance.

Consultation Question 50:

Other

Other

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I don't civil or non-religious ceremonies should be held in active religious or non-religious-belief venues. There is only one of the latter in the country, I think, Conway Hall. It would confuse things and muddy the waters. But the wording needs tightening up here because theoretically anywhere could be a "non-religious belief" venue.

Consultation Question 51:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

Why is there no "other" option here?

What does "responsible" mean in this context and what would happen if the celebrant got it wrong? I have been in situations where I have given guidance on the potential safety of a venue, or location within a venue often, but that is not the same as being "responsible". Assuming that there will be some guidance issued in relation to any final schemes, advising that a risk assessment is good practice would be welcomed.

Consultation Question 52:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

In relation to "dignified" the answer is undoubtedly yes - which doesn't mean the ceremony can't be fun or joyful. Because for Humanists working with a couple is an iterative process, any issues can be ironed out along the way. I remember one of my colleagues, for instance, agreeing to officiate at an Alice-in-Wonderland themed wedding, but refusing to do this dressed as the White Rabbit (or any other character), as this would undermine the dignity of the event.

However, in terms of safety, those issues surely fall to the venue, be it a formal venue such as a hotel or state home, or a private house. If the wedding is taking place in public space, the issues can become more difficult, and a humanist celebrant would normally visit such a venue with the couple in advance to identify any likely risks. As mentioned above, I would always do a risk assessment, but I would not take a personal responsibility for the venue being safe.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The "yes" here relates to safely - see my earlier remarks about risk assessments.

The question of dignity is more subjective, however, and only the most general of advice should be given. The wedding I did at the reclamation yard could have been assumed by some to be undignified (if you characterised it as a scrapyard). It was, however, one of the most beautiful weddings I have ever conducted, under an ancient oak hung with white ribbons. The ability to make appropriate choices is one of the many things that a belief organisation like Humanists UK can offer, and would be hard to assess if commercial celebrants were allowed to conduct legal ceremonies.

Consultation Question 53:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This might be desirable for safety, though again I think that "dignity" takes us on to dangerous ground, and I am not sure how it would be assessed except by the celebrant.

Please share your views below:

That's the problem! Perhaps local authorities charging a small fee? In an optional system, venues would presumably only ask for this if they thought it increased their market value.

This is a choice that some may wish to exercise.

A cheap civil wedding option must remain available. A large majority of couples currently having a humanist wedding also have a civil marriage in order to gain legal recognition, in spite of not wanting to do so.

At present, those having a Humanist ceremony can find it hard to access the cheapest statutory wedding option, which is often not on the websites and not mentioned by registrars to person callers. This seems to be financially driven, and particularly penalises those wanting a Humanist wedding.

It should be prescribed that:

- ☐ Registrars must make known the availability of the minimum-fee option, wherever they advertise that other options are available;
- ☐ Registrars must make such ceremonies generally available, across all days of the week, and in a wider range of registration offices (perhaps even all);
- ☐ Registrars must not be able to restrict who attends such a ceremony, beyond what physical space allows, or what niceties such ceremonies might contain, beyond what is necessary for the punctual running of the ceremony.

The need for such legislation would be less acute were humanist marriages legally recognised.

Yes, I am aware of couples who have chosen not to get married at all, because they wanted a legal humanist wedding and could not face either the cost, or the inconvenience, of having to have two ceremonies.

The experience in Scotland demonstrates that legalising Humanist marriage leads not just to a rise in Humanist marriages, but to a rising number of weddings overall.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1. These costs, additional on the cost of a Humanist wedding, can put couples off having a legal wedding, or having a wedding at all. As mentioned several times above, registrars do not make the cheapest options known to clients, and can raise all sorts of illegitimate barriers and concerns. One couple were told, for instance, that they could not have their register office wedding after their Humanist ceremony, it had to be before, which is complete nonsense. I often have to support couples in sorting these issues out.
2. Approved premises are almost all expensive, and often require couples to commit to extra costs, such as the catering. There are few approved premises, round me [REDACTED] at least, which allow couples to marry on a "DIY" basis, and they are booked up far ahead.
3. No views
4. This can be a much better bet for couples, and is something I explore with couples who have not yet fixed their venues. The Covid situation has demonstrated that it can also put couples more in control of how and when the ceremony happens. The only disadvantage at present is the need for that additional, register office ceremony
5. As above. The register office wedding costs are an unfortunate and unnecessary tax on Humanist couples.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1. As above, if register office weddings are required, the cheap, basic option should be far more widely available, and more fully advertised
2. These savings would be considerable, but even more important is the opportunity to marry in an appropriate and meaningful setting
3. As above.

Consultation Question 87:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

At present, if couples want registration to happen on the same day or in the same place as their Humanist weddings, the costs can be astronomical. In Kent, for instance, registrars charge £675 to coming out at a weekend to a registered venue, even though they are delivering essentially the same ceremony each time, which is more than most Humanist celebrants charge for a ceremony which they have been working on for many months. the legalisation of Humanist weddings would be a welcome cost-saver

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

There are many opportunities for venues who do not want to go through the current registration scheme, either because they do not meet some of the criteria, or because they do not do weddings often enough to pay the annual fees. There are many places where I have done weddings which would make great venues, but would not currently wish to apply for registration, not least because some of the wilder ones would not want to erect suitable structures. There are great business opportunities here. As mentioned above, the Scottish experience seems to show that the legalisation of Humanist weddings leads to a rise in the overall number of weddings.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1. It is not uncommon for Humanist couples to travel to Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland, the Republic of Ireland and Jersey to get married. Indeed there is even a hashtag: #elopetoscotland associated with this. So under the current circumstances, England and Wales lose out on business.
2. This would become more attractive if legal humanist marriage were available.

Consultation Question 91:

Please share your views below:

1. If commercial celebrants were allowed to conduct legal marriages there would be considerable cost to the Registrar General's Office in connection with approving training, accreditation and the maintenance of standards. This could be avoided by only recognising bona-fide, established organisations such as Humanists UK
2. The proposals would be largely beneficial to businesses
3. The proposals would be highly beneficial to Humanists UK
4. I do not agree with the proposal to allow commercial ("independent") officiants to conduct legal marriages. If they were, there would obviously be benefits to the officiants, but I fail to see what benefits there would be to couples.
5. the proposals could result in a considerable cost-saving for couples, and would broaden the options available particularly to those on lower incomes.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It should not be possible for someone to get married without being present at the wedding ceremony. Simply signing the marriage schedule is inadequate. Couples would be able to say anything they like or nothing at all. This is a major departure from the public declarations always considered foundational to the legal marriage ceremony. Please state that this risks undermining the solemnity of the wedding ceremony and denying the seriousness of the commitment being made. The idea that a couple should be able to completely personalise their ceremony comes from a wrong view of marriage. A wedding is not just about the couple. The couple enter into a union which is understood by society and has been legally defined. So society and the law have an interest in the making of a public declaration. The logic of a wholly self-defined marriage ceremony is for marriage to be decoupled from the law and wider society. Marriage would become an entirely private matter, rather like a personal hobby.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I want to emphasise again the seriousness and solemnity of a marriage ceremony. A particular ceremony should not just be allowed because the couple wants it, but because it is appropriate for such a significant event. The idea that a couple should be able to choose everything about a wedding ceremony comes from a wrong view of marriage. A wedding is a public declaration in which society and the state have an interest. Unofficial wedding ceremonies have included themes such as Alice in Wonderland, James Bond, Lord of the rings and many other fanciful types of themes which are inappropriate to a solemn , legal occasion, like people dressed as star Wars characters in a court of law

Consultation Question 44:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There needs to be specific wording that establishes a legal contract in any marriage ceremony no matter what religion or belief or lack of either. First and foremost marriage is a legal contract; when it becomes just the specific wishes of the couple themselves it will soon become even easier to terminate it and will contribute to the further breakdown of society today.

Please share your views below:

Very difficult to say

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There may be occasions when this is necessary

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The open doors requirement was introduced hundreds of years ago as a protection against forced marriage. This is still a problem in our society. Removing the requirement encourages a false perception that marriage is a private matter without any public significance.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I want to reiterate the seriousness and solemnity of a marriage ceremony. Venues should not simply be allowed because marrying couples want them, but because they are appropriate places to hold such a significant ceremony. There are some specific benefits in a wider variety of venues being allowed (for example churches who do not own their own building), but I want to express caution that this should not legitimise inappropriate settings.

outdoors,, on inland waters such as lakes or rivers,, in the air, and/or, in private homes.

Please share your views below:

For instance for couples having ceremonies “in the air”, meaning the safe and dignified test doesn’t seem too hard to meet. Would weddings also be allowed in McDonald’s?

• Unofficial wedding ceremonies have taken place in an S&M dungeon, underwater, and at a Comic Book convention with a couple dressed as comic book heroes. It would be completely incompatible with the dignity of marriage for venues like these to host legal weddings.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It should not be possible for someone to get married without being present at the wedding ceremony. A person just signing a schedule is not enough. It cannot be proper if people say anything the like or nothing at all. Public declarations whether in church or elsewhere, make the marriage binding, to take this away would lead to undermining the solemnity of marriage.

At the moment there is plenty of flexibility with a wedding ceremony so there is no need to change it. As long as the prescribed words are used, couples already have the chance to add things.

Surely expecting couples to use certain specific phrases is not too much, to show that both parties consent to a lifetime commitment.

Couples being allowed to completely personalise their ceremony gives the wrong idea of marriage. These words have been used for centuries and is the basis of a true union. Society acknowledges that the couple have made a declaration within the law, otherwise it becomes like a leisure activity.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A marriage ceremony is a serious and lawful bond. Just because a couple want to have a ceremony a certain way, cannot be the reason it should take place. A marriage service has to be appropriate under the law.

A couple cannot be allowed to choose what they want as it gives the wrong impression of marriage, which is a solemn and dignified event. A wedding ceremony is a legally binding service and a public declaration of a lifetime commitment.

There have already been unofficial wedding ceremonies with such themes as James Bond, Flash Gordon with some couples dressed as hedgehogs. This totally undermines the seriousness of wedding vows. If these proposals are successful then any number of "Official" weddings could become the norm, once again threatens the sanctity of marriage.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

By repealing the "open doors" requirement it would do away with idea that weddings are a lawfully binding declaration of two people within the public domain.

The "open doors" requirement has been in existence for hundreds of years to protect against forced and sham marriages. This is still a problem in our society today.

By removing this requirement, it takes away the public part of a wedding service and encourages it to be a private affair without accepting the dignity and commitment of marriage.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

To allow wedding ceremonies to take place anywhere, will take the seriousness and solemnity from a marriage. Who will make these decisions, each person will have a different view about what is "dignified and safe".

Marriage is a lawful, legally binding service which by definition means serious and solemn, and just because a couple want to get married in Burger King does not mean it should be permitted. Does this mean that underwater or jumping from a plane would be allowed, if so, where is the seriousness and dignity which is needed for couple to show their commitment to a lifetime bond.

It could mean inappropriate places being used where the solemnity of marriage is usurped by the everyday.

Please share your views below:

It is inappropriate to allow inland waters, up in the air or private homes. As long as the outdoors is sympathetic with the solemnity of the service, then that maybe permitted.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The couple must both be present at the ceremony (and at the preliminaries).

Couples must be required to make formal public declarations as part of the ceremony - marriage is a serious commitment and should not be trivialised according to fashion or taste.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No - couples should not have free reign over every aspect of the ceremony, marriage is a serious commitment which should be recognised in the ceremony. If the ceremony is self-defined then it loses its value and importance as a social institution and expression of lifelong commitment.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Public access to weddings must be maintained, they are a social expression of commitment, not a private matter.
This requirement was introduced many years ago as a protection against forced marriage - this is still a significant issue

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a serious commitment and should not be trivialised. Any venue authorised to hold weddings must recognise this and be open to public access.

Please share your views below:

Any venue used must be open to public access which rules out in the air and private homes.

Consultation Question 49:

The phrase "public policy or morality" is exceedingly vague and lacks definition. There is no generally accepted "public morality" so organisations could be banned for simply because they espouse unfashionable beliefs. Certainly organisations should not be permitted to nominate officials if they promote unlawful purposes.

This includes both their own behaviour - (for example, not appearing as in some frivolous comic book outfit to a themed occasion) and also the dignity and solemnity of the marriage occasion itself. If the occasion is clearly dressed up in some frivolous fashion then that is inappropriate. It is difficult to provide guidance as to what is and what is not appropriate to the dignity and solemnity of the occasion that two people make a solemn contract for life but some definition should be attempted to help the officiant.

Consultation Question 36:

Consultation Question 37:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Although there should be some general oversight of marriages such that if a body or organisation supports marriage occasions on a regular basis which do not provide an appropriate format for the solemnisation of serious vows (as in 35 above) then this should be brought to the attention of the General Register Office such that it may be examined whether the nominating organisation has understood the duties of officiating at marriage.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is not clear from this that both parties should be present (e.g. one could just give written consent from a distance).

A marriage ceremony should include the public declaration of promises made by each party to the other. Such promises should be unambiguous and easily understood by both parties and by those witnessing the occasion. For this reason it is appropriate that some recognised phrases be used to prevent ambiguity and aid such a clear declaration. There is already considerable flexibility in the marriage ceremony and the phrases used. There is no advantage and potential for considerable future problems if the promises made are not clear. Hence a minimum of essential phraseology should be retained. Otherwise, if any wording can be used the whole affair can end up being trivialised which is not in accord with the "dignity and solemnity" mentioned above.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The dignity and solemnity of the occasion do need to be retained and also some degree of order such that it is clear to the assembled witnesses when the vows are being made. Themed weddings should not extend to trivialising the making of the vows and degrading the "dignity and solemnity" of promises made for a lifelong commitment.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Given the sad cases of forced marriages which still occur, it is essential that marriage ceremonies should be made public events.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The venue should be public (as above) so should be able to accommodate public witnessing and conducive to the dignity and solemnity of the occasion. They should not be at the whim of the couple being married but appropriate to the occasion.

Please share your views below:

Marriage outdoors should be permitted providing the vows can be clearly heard by the witnesses. Marriages taking place in private homes or on inland waters can satisfy the need for public witnessing but this could be limited by space so some venues may not be appropriate. Getting married in the air would normally provide even less space and would normally not be open to the public so would be inappropriate.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I don't understand why the parties should not be required to express that there is no impediment to their marrying each other during the ceremony. What if they lied in the preliminaries? Might not somebody be more likely to speak up during the service if the parties then, as now, said publically that they do not believe there is any such impediment?

Consultation Question 43:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Surely there must be a form of universally accepted words, as in a Church service for example. Are you seriously proposing that each couple could write the entire service from start to finish with as many or as few words as they wish. How is this ensuring the ceremony is conducted with dignity and solemnity?

Consultation Question 44:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I strongly disagree. It is profoundly disingenuous to scrap rules for Anglican, Jewish or Quaker weddings and also I believe the Faith group and its officiating officer have some say in whether a couple is entitled to be married by that Faith group.

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

I am not in favour of encouraging marriage for the sake of it.

Marriage is something that people should enter into as a union for life. They should do so after recognising it is something that since the beginning of time was a religious service and is something that should be conducted with dignity and solemnity, not a party in the outdoors or on some cruise ship that can be ended due to boredom!

Yes. People should not tell lies, especially about such an important matter. Society depends on the stability of marriage.

Consultation Question 18:

Anglican preliminaries should continue to be recognised as legal preliminaries to weddings officiated by the Church of England and the Church in Wales;
or

Please expand on your answer:

Clergy in the Church of England or Wales have a responsible and respected role in society. As such, they are suitable people for such a duty.

Consultation Question 33:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There should be some upper limit on the fees payable.

Consultation Question 34:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The location in which the ceremony takes place must be suitable for a major step in the lives of the couple. Town Halls, Conference centres, may provide a suitable venue, but it is easy to imagine frivolous locations which would not uphold the dignity and solemnity of the occasion. The nature of the location needs to be specified.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The emphasis needs to be on the solemnity of the occasion, since marriage is the backbone of a successful society. After the ceremony, there will be plenty of time for frivolity. Surgeons can play all sorts of silly games in their free time, but while performing an operation, they pay close attention to the grave significance of what they are doing. In the same way, the wedding reception can be a time for jokes and silliness, but the ceremony must convey the significance of lifelong commitment.

Consultation Question 37:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Ideally, yes, unless the organisation itself fails in the supervision of its officials.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There is no valid reason for this change, and in fact it is good that they be required to express vocally their consent to be married to each other and also audibly affirming that there is no impediment to their marrying each other.

This is a public act before witnesses and other people in the room. I can see no need for this proposed change. As members of society they are stating publicly their commitment to each other, which is serious, and intended to be permanent. They may wish to add other statements, but the two items above are essential.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The couple are able to indulge all their personal wishes at the reception, with all the bells and whistles they can conjure up, but the official wedding ceremony is a serious matter, which affects all of society. We all have an interest in successful marriages, which are the backbone of society. To cheapen the ceremony, as if it were Strictly Come Dancing, is a serious threat to our society.

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

On what grounds should this section be repealed?

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If there are such things as "forced marriages" isn't this requirement for "open doors" one of the protections against marrying under duress? We know that there are forced marriages, so let's keep them the ceremony as open as possible!

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A marriage is a social contract which needs to take place where the "public" can see what is happening, since it concerns them. There are many locations, be it churches, synagogues, mosques and local government premises, etc, where marriages can already take place. If the field is wide open, there may be ridiculous venues. There must be some kind of constraint on suitability for something which is so fundamental to our society.

Please share your views below:

Outdoors is impractical, in the UK as the weather is unpredictable; on lakes or rivers prevents the "public" from access to this important event. In the air and in private homes is also unsuitable, as the public will not be able to witness this important contract.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Public access is vital.

Consultation Question 50:

Yes

No

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is too important for society as a whole for a wedding to take place in a location which does not respect the official and social aspect of marriage. It is not a frivolous action, but an important contract which involves society as a whole. An officiant may be under pressure from the persons involved with the wedding - be it the couple or other people - to approve a location which is not fitting for the nature of the marriage contract.

Consultation Question 52:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is not at all clear what "safe" and "dignified" mean in this context. Officiants should not have the responsibility to approve venues, because of the pressure likely to be involved in seeking the approval of an unsuitable venue.

No

Please expand on your answer:

Whatever the definition, there will be ways to circumvent the intentions. This just makes the officiants job much harder.

Consultation Question 59:

No

Please expand on your answer:

One of the purposes of marriage is cohabitation, so there needs to be a valid reason for the failure of the couple to cohabit.

Please expand on your answer:

Officiants need to make sure that the wording and expression of such a serious ceremony as marriage is dignified. Also the Venue is very important. The present laws we have in place are satisfactory. My daughter was married in a hotel and the registrar emphasised the seriousness of the union. The seating was laid out to give the couple an 'isle' to walk down. Marriage is too important to be allowed to take place anywhere or anyhow a couple might like to choose.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The couple must both be present at a wedding and clearly state that there is no impediment to their marrying. The prescribed words under the current regulations should be retained. Couples can already add to these. Marriage is the bedrock of society and vows must be serious and declared before others.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a serious and solemn commitment. It must remain an official legal declaration to the whole of society.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The wording of the above seems to indicate that the person may not need to be at the ceremony and that a schedule can be signed at some other time. I would greatly fear that this would create a an open door for forced marriages.

Surly the ceremony should contain an expression of consent.

A nod of the head is not acceptable in a court of law one has to audibly answer.

I had an affidavit issued by an officer to say he had personally given a document to me but he had not. Signing schedules is weakening the marriage contract.

It is after all a contract which needs to be signed in front of an officiant.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This makes the wedding contract subject to the wishes or whims of the couple. They could chose not to have any witnesses.

The marriage contract has implications for society, it is a public declaration. Safe guards may be needed for some couples who may not be thinking responsibly.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Why would any one want to take away public scrutiny?

Private weddings make it easier for a forced marriage which we know is still an issue in our multicultural society, or to make it easier to commit polygamy.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

No to anywhere. I think this is too general the place needs to meet certain criteria for dignity and solemnity, as well as safety for the public / guests.

Please share your views below:

No to private homes as this is no longer a public ceremony.

No to in the air as it gives no jurisdiction over the ceremony unless it was a British registered airline.

Consultation Question 49:

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is a reasonable requirement, which may reduce a bigamous marriage being attempted or contracted.

Consultation Question 5:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This is a reasonable measure.

Consultation Question 6:

another period of time.

Please expand on your answer:

It is necessary for those who have good reason to prevent the marriage from taking place, e.g., by knowing one party or both parties to the proposed marriage are not free to marry for any legal reason, e.g., not divorced from a previous spouse, or under the statutory age for marriage.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

Concerns about sham or forced marriages or the capacity of either part to consent may not be apparent. Therefore, there should be an in-person interview in all applications to a registrar for a licence to marry.

Consultation Question 8:

Consultation Question 9:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

While it is acceptable, subject to the exception above, for the notice to be publicly displayed online, the practice of a printed notice being displayed at the registry office should also be continued.

Consultation Question 25:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This is a minimum safeguard, especially for the dignity of the service.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

The legality, public policy and sound morality demands this requirement.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

An officiant needs to be authorised by the Registrar in General in person, not simply the pro-tem person holding a said office.

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Without this provision, there could be a dispute concerning an individual officiant's qualification to acting as an officiant.

Consultation Question 29:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

My reply to Q 28 applies here,

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

No unfit or improper person should ever be authorised to undertake such an important responsibility.

Consultation Question 31:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

That goes without saying.

Consultation Question 32:

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 34:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Otherwise, it may not be clear in which capacity the individual is acting and, therefore, responsible for recording the marriage.

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a serious underaking, with moral and legal implications, which should be reflected clearly by the dignity and solemnity of the marriage service.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This is necessary to ensure that all officiants are aware of and respect the moral and legal importance of marriage, for those getting married and any children born of the union.

Consultation Question 37:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This makes sense, for the organisation nominating an individual would or should likely to be the first to know or become aware of any reason whether the individual continues to be suitable for the office.

Consultation Question 38:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This makes complete sense,

Consultation Question 39:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, because GRO's duty to ensure that the officiant acts legally, morally and with the necessary dignity is paramount.

Consultation Question 40:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

The upper age of the officiant may require evidence that the officiant remains sufficiently competent to carry out the duties, by making an enquiry, initially, of the individual, if aged, say, 75 or plus.

Consultation Question 41:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

All officiants need to be aware of any alterations in legislation concerning marriage.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

The present requirements demanded by law ensure that all the legal consequences are known and accepted by the couple marrying. Therefore, they should be retained publicly within the service, and not at the signing of register, which is conducted after the end of the service and, usually, not publicly.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There needs to be clear safeguards to protect the legality, morality, and dignity of the core of the service, which should not be left to the parties or officiant to decide.

Consultation Question 44:

No

Please expand on your answer:

My comments to Qs 42 and 43 apply also here.

Consultation Question 45:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A civil wedding ceremony containing a religious content is contradiction in terms. Under present legislation, after a civil marriage, a marriage ceremony may be religious service of marriage may be held, though not in the established Church of England.

Please share your views below:

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If only, because there can be circumstances when it is convenient, if not important, for a couple to be civilly married, before they are able to arrange a religious marriage service to suit their needs or those of their relatives and friends. Therefore, the facilitating section 46 of the Marriage Act 1949 should not be repealed.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A wedding service, including the statements to be made by the parties required by the state's law, is an act which has not only personal consequences but civil and legal implications, and, therefore, should be accessible by the doors of the place to be open,

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is essential that the place where the marriage is to take place reflects the importance, seriousness and dignity of the service. Therefore, it should be in a building which itself reflects the importance, seriousness and dignity of marriage.

Please share your views below:

Certainly not outdoors, nor on inland waters, nor in the air. If one of the parties is dying and confined to bed in a private home, a hospital or hospice, it should be allowable for the wedding to take place in one or other of those institutions.

If a wedding is permitted "in the air", how would it be unknown under which jurisdiction the wedding is subject, and which civil laws apply.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

For reasons I have given to some of the previous questions,

Consultation Question 50:

No

No

No

Please expand on your answer:

Non-religious weddings should never be allowed to be conducted in religious buildings, e.g., churches, chapel, or buildings, e.g., schools or halls clearly associated with a religious organisation. Non-religious weddings should be allowed in only secular buildings which reflect the gravity and dignity of weddings.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The state should impose the conditions which must be satisfied for any location to be acceptable and legal for a wedding to be held. If, over and above those conditions, the officiant decides that a particular location (i.e. building) is unsuitable, the officiant should be allowed to decline to hold the wedding in such a location.

Consultation Question 52:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, subject to the conditions imposed by state legislation.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The final decision must not be left for an individual officiant, but to the GRO.

Consultation Question 53:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It would be acceptable for the RGO to approve of particular locations for weddings, but the officiant should have the right to decline to officiate in such a location, if the officiant has acceptable reasons for so doing.

Please share your views below:

The RGO should be responsible for pre-approval of a location and to withdraw the approval should the conditions change, rendering the location unsuitable.

Any officiant or the appointing organisation should have the right to appeal to the RGO should a particular location cease to be suitable, and, in the meantime, for the officiant or the appointing organisation to decline from using such a location.

Chapter 8: Registration

Consultation Question 54:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The occupation of the parties to the marriage should be recorded, as at present, and not just those of their parents.

Consultation Question 55:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

The couple should have the choice of registering their marriage in English only, or in both English and Welsh, but not in Welsh only, given that a only minority of the population of Wales speak or understand Welsh, and such a document should be easily read and understood by any official in the U.K.

Consultation Question 56:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, provided that a hard copy of the electronic registration is able to produce at the time and supplied to the parties who had just married.

Chapter 11: Special types of wedding

Consultation Question 62:

Please share your views below:

My comments to a previous question address those problems, though I did not refer to those in prison, which should be included.

Consultation Question 63:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

If the circumstances allow time for notice of their intention to marry to be given and for them to be interviewed by a registration officer, that should take place. However, in the event of that not being possible to the likelihood of immanent death, then the officiant should be permitted to go ahead and, post factum, notify the registrar.

Consultation Question 68:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There could arise some ambiguity and, therefore, doubt about the precise location, whether it was within the costal waters, also this provision lacks the location of including a building which itself reflects the gravity and importance of the wedding.

No

Please expand on your answer:

No, for the same reasons given in reply to Q 68.

Consultation Question 70:

Please share your views below:

No, for the reasons given in reply to Q 68.

Consultation Question 71:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No, for the reasons given in response to Q68 and also because it is vital that the officiant should be identifiable for every wedding, should the legality, etc, of the marriage ever be contested.

I do not agree with marriages at sea, full stop.

Consultation Question 73:

Please share your views below:

There should be no demand for religious or non-religious marriages in international waters, because they would lack a building which reflects the importance and dignity of marriage.

No

Please expand on your answer:

This may be a burden on a person housebound.

Consultation Question 76:

(2) a separate fee from other forms of giving notice, set nationally on compassionate grounds at below cost level.

Please expand on your answer:

The terminally ill should not have to pay over and above the basic fee.

Consultation Question 77:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I agree with the status quo for couples who do not want a religious wedding nor one in any other building.

Consultation Question 82:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

The housebound should not be penalised for something beyond their control, though those detained should be expected to contribute to the extra cost.

Consultation Question 83:

(1) the fee should be set by regulation at a level below cost-recovery; or

Please expand on your answer:

Provision should also be waived if the terminally ill person could not afford the fee.

Consultation Question 84:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Why not?

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

I do not consider that the current law discourages or prevents couples from getting married. There are not a few couples, however, who do not realise the importance of having their union recognised legally, because they are ignorant, thinking that a long-term relationship, 'a common law marriage', has a legal basis, equivalent to a civil marriage. That myth should be clearly exposed. The legal costs of getting married are infinitesimally small when compared with the expenses that couples usually incur for the reception, etc.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

I believe that the Church of England has standard charges for marriages, but I do not know if they are so high that couples are ever deterred from marrying in a C of E church.

The Catholic Church has no such charges, and leave it to the couple to decide if or how much to donate.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a lifelong commitment a union which is understood by society and has been legally defined. Not just a personal commitment to each other, Both parties must be in attendance and publicly declare their intentions from a safety view as well as a legal view

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A wedding is a public declaration in which society and the state have an interest. A ceremony should have a sense of solemnity and be serious.

Not just be allowed because the couple wants it, but because it is appropriate for such a significant event. It is doubtful that many of the unofficial wedding ceremonies that have taken place including ones with themes such as 'Woodland Fairy' with ponies dressed as unicorns' while another couple dressed as hedgehogs have really reflected upon how serious marriage is.

Marriage has a public significance which the "open doors" requirement helps to convey. It is still a valid ancient protection against forced marriage which is still sadly needed in our society .

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A marriage ceremony should have seriousness and solemnity and venues should be appropriate places to hold such a significant ceremony.

If anywhere it seems the standards would not be hard to be met. Would weddings be allowed in for example a Burger King, or underwater, in a S & M dungeon, or in a star wars convention with participants dressed as characters ? It could not be compatible with the dignity of marriage for places like these to host legal weddings.

in the air, and/or, in private homes.

Marriage is not a 'fun' thing to be held in your local nightclub, swimming pool or similar. It is beautiful and enjoyable but must be done with seriousness and dignity in order to be taken as a lifelong investment worthy of expending spending energy and commitment in.

Too many marriages already fail and making the whole thing seem less serious is not going to help.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

1. it should not be possible for someone to get married without being present at the wedding ceremony. Simply signing the marriage schedule is inadequate.

2. What is being proposed is no longer a marriage but akin to a civil union. Couples would be able to say anything they like or nothing at all. This is a major departure from the public declarations always considered foundational to the legal marriage ceremony.

3. We must not undermine the solemnity of the wedding ceremony and denying the seriousness of the commitment being made.

4. I would say there is already enough flexibility in the wedding ceremony. Because the prescribed words are minimal, couples can add to them in all sorts of ways.

5. Surely it is not too burdensome to ask that some specific phrases are used to show that both people freely consent to the lifetime commitment they are entering into.

6. How would you now define a marriage? It is being redefined so that it is no longer a marriage. The idea that a couple should be able to completely personalise their ceremony comes from a wrong view of marriage. A wedding is not just about the couple. The couple enter into a union which is understood by society and has been legally defined. So society and the law have an interest in the making of a public declaration. The logic of a wholly self-defined marriage ceremony is for marriage to be decoupled from the law and wider society. Marriage would become an entirely private matter, rather like a personal hobby.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

1. Marriage should not be defined by a couple but by the society of which they are a part. Tell them to go for something like a civil union.

2. Marriage and a wedding is a public declaration in which society and the state have an interest.

3. Unofficial wedding ceremonies have included interesting but not themes worthy of a wedding ceremony which is both a joyful but also solemn matter. I understand themes like those below have been tried: Alice in Wonderland, James Bond, Lord of the Rings, Game of Thrones, Marvel comics, Beauty and the Beast, Harry Potter, Star Wars and Flash Gordon. One had a 'Woodland Fairy themed ceremony with ponies dressed as unicorns' while another couple dressed as hedgehogs. It is very doubtful that many of these reflected how seriously marriage should be taken

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

1. The "open doors" requirement helps convey the public nature of wedding declarations.

2. The open doors requirement was introduced hundreds of years ago as a protection against forced marriage.

This is still a problem in our society.

3. Removing the requirement encourages a false perception that marriage is a private matter without any public importance.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

1. Some folk with a sense of humour may suggest getting married in unsuitable venues, eg. public toilet, etc.

2. Ceremonies should take place in appropriate places for a significant public as well as private affair..

3. There are some specific benefits in a wider variety of venues being allowed (for example churches who do not own their own building), but inappropriate settings should be prohibited.

4. I understand unofficial wedding ceremonies have taken place in an S&M dungeon, underwater, and at a Comic Book convention with a couple dressed as comic book heroes. This seems to me to be completely incompatible with the dignity of marriage for venues like these to host legal weddings.

Please share your views below:

You have not allowed space for general reflection on your proposals

So this is a general point about your proposals, some of which are good.

However you have given acres of space thinking about the structures / wrappings surrounding a wedding but not at all considered what the content of a wedding and what marriage means.

Another consultation should have already taken place on the meaning of marriage.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The mutual consent to be married to each other should always be required to be made both orally and by signing a document at the marriage ceremony in the presence of the officiant. This is to ensure that it is clear to the Officiant that both parties really have consented to the marriage and there has been no coercion.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This puts too much responsibility on the Officiant to determine if the Parties proposals are sufficiently appropriate and dignified, and could lead to big variations in their decisions, that could lead to conflict. It is much better if standard forms of ceremony are determined, that must be included in all marriages, to reach appropriate levels of dignity.

Marriage is being made easier in a sense but taken less seriously in another. The expansion of venues and anything goes services undermines rather than strengthens the meaning of marriage as a life-long commitment of a man and woman to each other.

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I think it is important that people intending to get married should understand the context of the place where they are intending to get married. Marriage should not be regarded as a "quick fix" but something that has been thought through including an appropriate place and time.

Consultation Question 5:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a serious institution not a trivial one. Does this question mean that the interview could be held after the marriage? I think an interview is a very important part of the process.

Consultation Question 6:

another period of time.

Please expand on your answer:

Seven days is too short. How are couples going to be able to show that they are truly serious about their intention to get married and have had sufficient time to really think it through.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

This will totally undermine the value of marriage as it has been understood. The question has to be asked as to why couples are considering marriage when a civil partnership or some other "joining" would provide the same effect in law. Marriage is and should remain more important than just "signing up". By trivialising marriage, it means less, will be far less enduring and the obligations to one another traditionally made in a marriage ceremony will become meaningless. The adverse consequences for the fabric of society are immense already and will be far greater.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

I have no view on this.

There should be clearly stipulated and limited reasons why an original officiant has to be substituted to avoid the growth of specialist officiants who become known as officiants who work so closely within the law as to call into question whether they are acting legally.

Consultation Question 13:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I do not see any reason for the existing laws to be changed.

Consultation Question 14:

Clergy must have the power to call for evidence - or the couple can choose to be married in a registry office or other approved venue outside the church.

There should not be a need to get the couple separately except at the discretion of the officiant.

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

This is very important - otherwise the couple should choose to get married outside the church. The church should be free to set its own rules on this and other matters.

Consultation Question 23:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage within the Christian church has a meaning which is not or may not have the same meaning for other religious or non-religious organisations. To adopt this practice would further dilute the meaning of "marriage" in my opinion.

Consultation Question 24:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I think this further waters down the meaning of marriage. It is important that the bodies that are able to authorise marriage are confined as at present. An alternative would be to create another term for marriage for these types of ceremony.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Marriage was always intended to be a holy institution. I recognise this has been changing in recent history. I think that the term "marriage" should be limited to its current context and a different term used for other joining of couples legally. The Christian churches should be allowed to continue to conduct marriages.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Definitely do not agree. There should be a prescribed form of words and questions to which the couple are required to respond. The parties should be present to make the promises to the officiant - not sure if this is clear in the above question.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There should be a standard basis with no more flexibility than is currently permitted. Any other approach would lead to the watering down of marriage and the commitments that are so important.

Consultation Question 44:

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 45:

No

Please expand on your answer:

But I also accept that controlling this would be difficult. Is there any need to make a provision in this regard in the proposed legislation as it appears to open the door to mis-use of religious content.

Please see answer to Q45 above

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If couples choose to have a religious service after a civil ceremony it should be permitted. There does not appear to be any legal reason why this should not be so.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a public declaration of a couple getting married and this should not change. It is of public significance. Also, closed marriage ceremonies could encourage forced marriages.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

At registered locations only where public attendance is possible and where there is an "open door". Marriage is a legal and public matter not for the sole enjoyment of a couple to indulge themselves in a "ceremony".

Please share your views below:

Outdoors - seems fine as long as it is registered as a appropriate venue by the GRO

Inland waters - as Outdoors

In the air - should not be permitted. It seems frivolous, diminishes the value of marriage and impossible for an "open door" to exist.

Private homes - should not be permitted as there is scope for abuse and avoiding "open door".

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Public access is vital for reasons previously stated.

Consultation Question 50:

Other

Other

Other

Please expand on your answer:

It should be the decision of the religious organisation as to whether civil ceremonies should be permitted in religious venues. I feel this is a very important issue for those with religious views. It will become a controversial political argument if this is allowed as the state will be seen as trying to impose its power over religious organisations. Why would a non-religious couple seek to be married in a church other than for vexatious reasons or a frivolous "I like the building" type of reason which trivialises the meaning of marriage and would diminish the value of a religious building based wedding to a religious couple. There is just as much responsibility on the law to uphold the rights and expectations of a religious couple as those of a secular couple.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

GRO responsibility.

Consultation Question 52:

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

My main concern is that any change might reduce the importance of marriage. The central question is why is marriage so important? Is it just for the couple or for the benefit of society as a whole? I would strongly argue it is the latter and this should not be lost sight of.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

As Q85, it is very necessary to have a formal, legalised wedding ceremony that reflects the importance of two people joining together. Any trivialisation cannot be justified. There are too many marriage breakups as things stand which signifies to me that marriage is not taken seriously enough. We have to consider why the changes are being considered. It is not simply for the benefit of the couple. It is for the benefit of society.

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is a public declaration of a commitment being made and as such should be heard by all who are present. The existing prescribed words should be used but may be added to if required. It is a legal agreement that is being entered into and those present are witnesses to it and must therefore understand the promises being made.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A wedding is a public occasion and not exclusively about the couple getting married. Therefore it is not up to them alone to make decisions about the form of the ceremony. They are entering a lifelong commitment, recognised by society and with legal requirements. Both the Law and society are involved in this public declaration and the form and ceremony must reflect that.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The venue must allow for the dignity and solemnity of the occasion. A legal agreement is being entered into which is intended to last until the death of one or both parties. As such it is open to members of the public to witness as well as a legal representative. This could not be guaranteed in some more 'adventurous' venues eg deep sea diving, in a deep cave, on private property.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

1. Couples who are serious about marriage are not discouraged or prevented from getting married, having access to either a religious or a civil ceremony.
2. These proposals would definitely facilitate and encourage those who want a wedding with a novelty value rather than a dignified occasion signifying the seriousness of a lifelong commitment to each other. No doubt this would lead to an increase in the number of those being legally married - until they look for an easy divorce once the novelty's worn off.

Limiting the banns to just the wedding church is very restrictive. It is important that the banns be read in both parish churches of the parties concerned, as those locations are likely to know the individuals, whereas the wedding church congregation might not know them.

It is important that the legal aspects of a marriage are fully complied with. Documentary evidence shown at the start would help prevent sham marriages. Meeting each of the couple separately would also help prevent sham marriages.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The parties must express their consent and lack of impediment, both orally and publicly during the marriage ceremony. Both parties must be physically present, along with the witnesses and public.

Marriage is a very serious commitment and therefore the ceremony must reflect that, in prescribed words and in public oral commitment.

A marriage is not just about the couple themselves; they are committing to a lifelong public commitment that is understood by society and is legally defined. It is not a private matter where the parties can say what they like. There is already scope within the ceremony for parties to add to the wording, but the basic wording must be defined and be legally binding.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a public and societal commitment, and must therefore be commenced in the agreed public legal declaration. To allow the parties to make an alternative form would go completely against this. Marriage must be taken seriously and therefore the ceremony too must be taken seriously.

Consultation Question 44:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriages should conform to a recognised format.

Consultation Question 45:

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is not a private matter - it is a public declaration of lifelong commitment in a form accepted by society. To exclude the public from a wedding would go completely against this.

Having open doors also helps to combat sham weddings and forced marriage.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a solemn and serious matter, and hence venues should be appropriate places to hold such significant events.

Please share your views below:

Venues must have public access. They should be dignified, solemn and respected places.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The approval of a venue must be given by society, not by an officiant. The venue must allow for a solemn, serious, public ceremony.

Consultation Question 52:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

It is the responsibility of society to only allow venues to be used if they are serious, solemn and public places.

Clearly if an officiant spots a dangerous building defect just before a ceremony commences, then it is his responsibility to point it out, but it is society's responsibility to check and authorise venues for suitability.

I agree with the proposed duty, but it does not go far enough. Officiants should have a wider responsibility to ensure that the content and tone of the legal ceremony upholds the dignity and solemnity of marriage.

The proposals need to define what is meant by 'dignity' and 'solemnity'. The consultation seems to view ceremonies taking place "in the air" as being compatible with these tests, which suggests they are easy standards to reach.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It should not be possible for someone to get married without being present at the wedding ceremony. Simply signing the marriage schedule is inadequate.

Couples would be able to say anything they like or nothing at all. This is a major departure from the public declarations always considered foundational to the legal marriage ceremony.

This risks undermining the solemnity of the wedding ceremony and denying the seriousness of the commitment being made.

There is already a large amount of flexibility in the wedding ceremony. The prescribed words are minimal and couples can add to them in all sorts of ways.

It is not very much to ask that some specific phrases are used to show that both people freely consent to the lifetime commitment they are entering into.

The idea that a couple should be able to completely personalise their ceremony comes from a wrong view of marriage. A wedding is not just about the couple. The couple enter into a union which is understood by society and has been legally defined. So society and the law have an interest in the making of a public declaration. The logic of a wholly self-defined marriage ceremony is for marriage to be decoupled from the law and wider society. Marriage would become an entirely private matter, rather like a personal hobby.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I reiterate; A particular ceremony should not just be allowed because the couple wants it, but because it is appropriate for such a significant event.

The idea that a couple should be able to choose everything about a wedding ceremony comes from a wrong view of marriage. A wedding is a public declaration in which society and the state have an interest.

Unofficial wedding ceremonies have included themes such as Alice in Wonderland, James Bond, Lord of the Rings, Game of Thrones, Marvel comics, Beauty and the Beast, Harry Potter, Star Wars and Flash Gordon. One had a 'Woodland Fairy themed ceremony with ponies dressed as unicorns' while another couple dressed as hedgehogs. It is very doubtful that many of these reflected how seriously marriage should be taken

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The "open doors" requirement helps convey the public nature of wedding declarations.

The open doors requirement was introduced hundreds of years ago as a protection against forced marriage. This is still a problem in our society.

Removing the requirement encourages a false perception that marriage is a private matter without any public significance.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I reiterate the seriousness and solemnity of a marriage ceremony. Venues should not simply be allowed because marrying couples want them, but because they are appropriate places to hold such a significant ceremony.

There are some specific benefits in a wider variety of venues being allowed (for example churches who do not own their own building), but I express caution that this should not legitimise inappropriate settings.

Please share your views below:

The term "safe and dignified" doesn't seem too hard to meet. Would weddings also be allowed in McDonald's?

Unofficial wedding ceremonies have taken place in an S&M dungeon, underwater, and at a Comic Book convention with a couple dressed as comic book heroes. It would be completely incompatible with the dignity of marriage for venues like these to host legal weddings.

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is about (among other things) providing lifelong stability, and the relationship between the married couple and the community. It's meant to be a serious, well thought through commitment for life through all circumstances that may arise - however unpredictable. Therefore at least one of the couple should have a substantial connection to the community in which they are marrying. It 7 days is already too short.

Consultation Question 5:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This does not provide for demonstration of any of commitment, stability or connection with the community.

Consultation Question 6:

another period of time.

Please expand on your answer:

One month or more.

It's a serious step and commitment. It needs to be thought about carefully. Too many marriages end in divorce, which greatly harms children, families, communities and society as a whole. The gravity of it should never be undermined - and having such special requirements makes it a greater achievement and milestone in life, with correspondingly greater meaning and joy.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

No.

Sham or forced marriages would be much easier: you can't see who else is behind the camera, listening in or even watching, making intimidation easy. Nor can you see if the couple is actually concentrating on the interview, or (for example) simultaneously answering messages or playing games. Nothing should get in the way of reinforcing the multidimensional importance of marriage.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

Yes - sometimes distance makes it difficult to have the interview for both partners at or near the place of marriage; though this shouldn't reduce the need for (a) the interview and (b) one of the couple to hold it in the community in which they will marry.

Consultation Question 9:

But the ministers of all recognised religions with well-established organisation and structure should be allowed to officiate - not just Anglicans.

Consultation Question 24:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Because any such belief system is created by the people involved, which makes it subject to change on whim, and judgement as to whether or not the belief system is adhered to becomes merely a matter of personal self-affirmation.

The proposed definition includes the Flat Earth Society and New-Age hippies as religions, which clearly they are not. Nor is humanism - indeed, the fact that increasingly they ape Christian services in the marking of births, marriages and deaths, proves that they are a non-religion in search of a meaning. All other so-called religions or people would be free to create such pseudo-religions to justify anything that they wish.

Please share your views below:

On the contrary, there should be a list of religions that SHOULD be allowed to officiate, and non-religious belief organisations should NOT be allowed. The religions that are allowed should be those with well established structures and organisations, as those are the only ones who can be held to account for any abuses that may arise. ## Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

Your proposals all trivialise and de-value marriage, which is (and should remain) seen by all as the "gold standard" relationship, an aspiration and ideal that is achievable by all.

Marriage has moral and community aspects in addition to its legal, emotional and religious ones. Marriage is meaningless if not life-long and exclusive, and loses a great deal of its meaning if it's not open to raising a family.

Huge numbers of research studies world-wide have shown that marriage is the best framework in which to raise children, for the benefit of those children - and also for the benefit of both partners as they can be most confident in the ongoing nature of the relationship. Studies have also shown how marriage and family breakdown / abandonment harms society and community at large. The partners themselves gain greatly from the mutual commitment to tackle all the issues that life throws up, together and in total mutual trust and sharing, through all its ups and downs. It should not be devalued or trivialised in any way whatsoever.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

Availability of locations is more than adequate currently - indeed, excessively so as it's already started on the slippery slope of trivialising marriage.

Marrying in places of worship should be encouraged: it adds a spiritual dimension to the mutual / family / community commitment. But only religious locations and ministers of established, well-structured religions should be allowed to conduct legal marriages (others should be encouraged to bless civil marriages) in order to prevent abuses, and avoid creating loopholes around the prevention of abuses such as coercion, illegal contracting of marriage, malign motives and motives and wrongful motives such as obtaining rights to inheritance, power of attorney, nationality or titles.

But only religious locations and ministers of established, well-structured religions should be allowed to conduct legal marriages (others should be encouraged to bless civil marriages) in order to prevent abuses, and avoid creating loopholes around the prevention of abuses such as coercion, illegal contracting of marriage, malign motives and motives and wrongful motives such as obtaining rights to inheritance, power of attorney, nationality or titles.

Your proposals all trivialise and de-value marriage, which is (and should remain) seen by all as the "gold standard" relationship, an aspiration and ideal that is achievable by all.

Marriage has moral and community aspects in addition to its legal, emotional and religious ones. Marriage is meaningless if not life-long and exclusive, and loses a great deal of its meaning if it's not open to raising a family.

Huge numbers of research studies world-wide have shown that marriage is the best framework in which to raise children, for the benefit of those children - and also for the benefit of both partners as they can be most confident in the ongoing nature of the relationship. Studies have also shown how marriage and family breakdown / abandonment harms society and community at large. The partners themselves gain greatly from the mutual commitment to tackle all the issues that life throws up, together and in total mutual trust and sharing, through all its ups and downs. It should not be devalued or trivialised in any way whatsoever.

Consultation Question 91:

Please share your views below:

Costs for marriage should apply to all, equally; the additional costs of provision of services for those housebound etc. for reasons outside their control should be socialised among all marriage costs.

Marriage should never be profit-generating, and businesses / individuals should be prevented from any creative cost-allocation in charging; they should charge fees set by the local authority.

Apart from those housebound etc. for reasons outside their control, there should be charges (at cost) for attending other venues. These charges should always be substantially lower than those for renting the premises at a registry office, in order to encourage religious weddings as they add substantial spiritual and community value to the wedding and subsequent marriage.

Established religions with strong structures (only) should be permitted to nominate (with pre-approval guaranteed other than in exceptional circumstances) venues and registrars - the registrars being selected from among their ordained/certified ministers.

Fees charged to couples are not high and therefore not a substantial impediment to marriage. They should remain that way.

Consultation Question 2:

Please share your views below:

I am responding to this consultation as a law professor with expertise in the interaction between law and religion.

The reforms in the Law Commission's paper are much needed and would make a significant step forward. This is especially true in relation to the twin issues of religious ceremonies that do not comply with the requirements of the Marriage Act 1949 (often called 'unregistered religious marriages') and ceremonies conducted by belief organisations such as Humanists UK or by independent celebrants (often called 'non-religious marriages') which also lack legal effect unless a civil ceremony under the Act has also taken place.

My research has argued that issues raised by these two different types of non-qualifying wedding ceremonies differ slightly. (This research will be published as R Sandberg, 'Religion and Marriage Law: The Need for Reform' (Bristol University Press, 2021). In relation to non-religious marriages, reform is needed in order to fill a gap in the Marriage Act which makes a firm distinction between civil marriage solemnised by State officials and religious marriages. By contrast, there is no such gap for religious marriages. The problem is not that religious marriages cannot be legally recognised under the Act. It is rather that the requirements required for such recognition indirectly discriminate against some religions: the requirements that the wedding must be inside a registered place of worship and that a prescribed choice of words must be used do not fit with some religious traditions. It is this that has led to some religious marriages in those traditions not complying with the requirements of the Marriage Act 1949. Moreover, while several calls for reform have acted on the presumption that unregistered religious marriages are problematic per se, that is not the case. Unregistered religious marriages can lead to discrimination, disadvantage and suffering – and there is a need for legal redress to be provided in such situations. However, this is not true of all unregistered religious marriages. There are various reasons why people enter into unregistered religious marriages. Some enter into religious marriages so that they can date. It allows them to be together without being chaperoned. A legally binding marriage would be inappropriate and premature. Unregistered religious marriages are not a problem where they are entered into wittingly and voluntarily. Autonomous and freely informed adults should be free to voluntarily enter into any intimate relationships. There is an argument that legal redress might need to be provided if that relationship changes over time in a way that causes a detriment to one of the parties: if one gives up work or goes part time to look after children or the other party, for instance. But other than that, if the unregistered religious marriage results from a free choice by both of the parties then that should be respected.

The Law Commission proposals will not completely solve either issue for two reasons: first, the Law Commission is hampered by its terms of reference meaning that, as it concedes, it can only mitigate the unregistered marriage issue; second, there are a few shortcomings in what the Law Commission proposes especially in relation to the definition of belief systems and the fact that independent celebrants are treated differently. This means that the Law Commission's proposals will not completely fulfil either of the two points of principle. Moreover, there is a significant risk that the Law Commission's recommendations may be cherry-picked by the Government rather than enacted in full. This would be disastrous given that the strength of the Law Commission's proposals is that it comes as a complete package.

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

The twin issues that I discussed above have come to the fore during the pandemic since exceptions made for marriages have not always applies to unregistered ceremonies and non-religious weddings. This has led to confusion but the fact that this has proved problematic and has caused governments to change the exceptions highlights the importance of such ceremonies and that it no longer makes sense that such ceremonies are not legally binding.

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

My general thoughts on this section: The emphasis upon the importance of preliminaries and the Law Commission's suggestions as to the modernisation of the process is sound. This would facilitate a minimalistic law on where and how marriages take place which would allow couples to personalise their ceremonies. This would also have the effect of mitigating the problem of unregistered marriages by removing obstacles that are currently in the way of those who seek a legally recognised marriage but are currently frustrated by the requirements of the Marriage Act 1949. The creation of the position of officiant and the focus on stringent rules as to preliminaries will enable equal and minimalistic regulation of where and how weddings take place. The creation of the position of officiant (who must be in attendance at all weddings but need not necessarily be the celebrant) would be an important step forward, providing a person to whom legal duties and responsibilities can be attached while recognising that marriages will be solemnised in different traditions in different ways.

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

My general views on this section is that the officiant system proposed is to be welcomed. The changes would mitigate the issue of unregistered religious marriages to the extent that the problem is caused by the current restrictions requiring a registered place of worship. The Law Commission proposals would also go some way to resolve issues concerning non-religious marriages by facilitating non-religious belief weddings on an equal basis to religious ones.

The Law Commission's proposed creation of the role of officiant to whom legal responsibilities, duties and powers will be attached is an excellent one. This change alone would make a considerable difference.

However, I have a number of concerns with the detail of what is being proposed in terms of who can be officiants. The Law Commission proposes a schema that deals with non-religious belief organisations (such as humanists) and independent celebrants differently. This separate treatment, caused by the terms of reference, is problematic if the nomination category is reserved to religion or belief organisations only. This is because the independent officiants groups would not be limited to representatives of a religion or belief. Once marriages can be solemnised by non-State officials who are not representing religion or belief organisations, it makes little sense to limit the organisations that can nominate to religion or belief organisations. A preferable approach would be to either open up nominations to organisations generally or to have a rigorous and effective definition of religion or belief and then to limit (or remove) the individual application route.

Consultation Question 20:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This sits oddly, however, with the proposed relaxation of the rules on religious content. Those proposals while laudable will make matters even more complicated and confusing and would be unnecessary if others forms of weddings (especially those by independent celebrants and religious and belief groups whose practices do not fit with the current law) are accommodated.

Consultation Question 21:

It makes perfect sense for there to be consistency on this.

Consultation Question 22:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The paper notes that both the Church of England and the Church in Wales 'have generally accepted duties to conduct the weddings of their parishioners when called upon to do so' and this merits special treatment (para 5.77). The paper also points to the formal process of ordination and the internal discipline in those churches and states that in contrast 'within many religious traditions the question of who conducts a wedding is far more fluid' (para 5.84). However, this misses the point slightly: the difference is that in respect of the Church of England its processes of appointment and discipline are part of the law of the land. This leaves the Church in Wales in a slightly odd position: its differential treatment is legally justified on the basis that its general processes of appointment and discipline were formerly part of the law of the land but its specific role in relation to marriage has been preserved. This might leave the Church in Wales in a precarious position and this is something worth discussing with them.

Consultation Question 23:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I agree with using a nomination system for organisations who wish to solemnise marriages.

However, I think that the paper is unduly critical of prescribed systems, especially since Anglican clergy would effectively remain prescribed. In my view, the need for a prescribed status category can be overcome by providing for State officials to be appointed and by the use of continuity provisions. Continuity provisions would ensure that religions that already solemnise marriages would be automatically included as nominating organisations and that individuals who already conduct marriages be automatically included as officiants subject to requirements for on-going training. The Guernsey model provides an excellent model in this regard. Provision would also need to be made so that Existing provisions concerning religious same sex marriages would continue to apply.

In my view, nominating organisations should not be limited to religion or belief organisations and would therefore also include umbrella organisation of independent celebrants and indeed any other organisation that wished to solemnise marriages. This would overcome the problems with the definitions of religion or belief and the question of whether and how independent celebrants can fit within the system. Such an approach would not place too much of a burden upon registration officials especially if continuity provisions are included so that religions that already marry are automatically included. Limiting the types of organisation who can nominate does not make sense once the system allows independent officiants to personally apply to be able to solemnise.

This might be seen as opening the floodgates to a large number of new organisations with no thresholds in place. Yet, the Law Commission's proposals which do limit nominating organisations to religion or belief organisations also suffers from this same problem in that the inadequate definition of belief and the low threshold imposed would also open the floodgates. Extending nominating organisations beyond religion or belief organisations would be preferable to the Law Commission's truly officiant focused approach for independent celebrants could place a significant burden on registration officials.

A threshold could be put in place by insisting that nominating organisations do not have the principal or sole purpose of solemnising marriages. This would follow the approach found in section 14 of the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013 which defined 'belief organisation' as 'an organisation whose principal or sole purpose is the advancement of a system of non-religious beliefs which relate to morality or ethics' and the aspects of the Irish approach, though rather than using the term 'secular' recognition would simply be given to organisations. This would exclude organisations set up solely to solemnise marriages. This would not necessarily exclude independent celebrants provided that they carried out other services. This would address concerns about the commercialisation of weddings.

However, an argument could be advanced on human rights grounds that protection should only be afforded on grounds of religion or belief. If this was followed then it would be important to have a rigorous definition of religion or belief and a significant threshold. This needs to be counterbalanced against the risk of taking an overly conservative approach which would indirectly discriminate against new forms of religiosity or belief. The Irish model again would be a useful template in this regard. The law could require that the organisation has the principal or sole purpose of advancing a system of religious or non-religious beliefs and that they have a set number of adherents or have existed for a set number of years.

There may still be a need for individual applications by genuinely independent celebrants but that would be much reduced if the nominating system includes non-religious organisations and most independent celebrants. In terms of the individual application system, the Jersey and Guernsey systems provide a template of how this could be achieved with an individual application process for civil celebrants.

Consultation Question 24:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This parasitical use of the Hodkin definition is problematic in that not all non-religious belief systems may be 'secular' either in the common use of the word or in the sense it was used in Hodkin. Lord Toulson went on to say that 'by spiritual or non-secular I mean a belief system which goes beyond that which can be perceived by the senses or ascertained by the application of science'. Moreover, this parasitical definition tells us very little. It is a functional definition which reveals even less than the human rights and discrimination law jurisprudence on the definition of belief. The existing definition found in section 14 of the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013, which speaks of 'an organisation whose principal or sole purpose is the advancement of a system of non-religious beliefs which relate to morality or ethics', would be preferable. It is noteworthy that despite adapting the Hodkin definition, the Law Commission accepts that it is not sufficient, noting that it needs to be considered 'whether the definition of a non-religious belief organisation should be limited further, by a list of exclusions of the types of group that would not qualify to nominate officiants, such as political parties, trade unions, or sporting organisations' (para 3.43) Similar issues have developed in the discrimination law case law and the definition found in section 14 of the 2013 Act would go some way to resolving them. Although the Law Commission's terms of reference state that they are bound by the definition in Hodkin, this does not mean that it should be the basis for defining non-religious beliefs.

Please share your views below:

I would use the Irish legislation - the Civil Registration Act 2004 - as a template.

'Secular body' is defined in section 45A as 'an organised group of people' which 'has not fewer than 50 members', where 'its principal objects are secular, ethical and humanist', its members 'meet regularly in relation to their beliefs', which does not have rules regarding marriage that contravene the law, has been in existence for a continuous period of not less than five years, 'does not have making a profit as one of its principal objects' and maintains a register of its members. The body must satisfy the authorities that it 'has appropriate procedures in writing for selecting, training and accrediting members as fit and proper persons to solemnise marriages'. Political parties, bodies that promote a political party, bodies that promote a political cause, trade unions and chambers of commerce are all excluded from the definition as are any bodies that promote purposes that are unlawful, contrary to public morality or policy, support terrorism or are for the benefit of an organisation membership of which is unlawful.

This provides a useful template of how a non-religious belief category could be defined but possibly without the rule forbidding political causes. It would also be wise to add a requirement that the the organisation must have a principal purpose other than the provision of legally recognised marriages and / or the training of celebrants for conducting such marriages.

Consultation Question 25:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The first requirement is that there is 'at least 20 members who meet regularly for worship or in furtherance of their beliefs'. This figure of 20 has been suggested because, although it 'might seem like a relatively low threshold, ... this has been the minimum figure for registering a place of worship for weddings for over 180 years without, as far as we know, causing any problems' (para 5.97). However, this requirement may not be appropriate for small groups or religions and belief systems who do not gather communally. The paper circumvents this by suggesting that a relaxed approach should be taken to its interpretation. It notes that this requirement 'will not pose problems for interfaith ministry groups' because although they 'do not generally hold large religious services for the public' their members communicate amongst themselves regularly and they provide pastoral care and so there are 'meetings to plan and provide support to one another in how they engage with the community are meetings in furtherance of their religious beliefs' (para 5.98). It is even suggested that this 'requirement could be satisfied by remote meetings amongst celebrants or the executive of the organisation in relation to community outreach and training of celebrants' (para 5.131). These examples show the inadequacy of this requirement. Insisting instead that the organisation has existed for a certain number of years, as many of the amendments and proposals discussed in the last chapter did, would also be a conservative approach but one that would be more appropriate.

The second requirement is that the organisation should have 'a wedding service or a sincerely held belief about marriage' (para 3.44). The purpose of this rule is to 'help to limit the power to nominate officiants to those groups that would genuinely intend to officiate at weddings' (para 5.99). It is unclear what the words 'genuinely intend' mean here; perhaps it is a reference to excluding sham marriages. But it is questionable whether sham marriages can be policed in this way given that the requirement would 'not be seen as any form of check by the state on the content of the ceremony' and would not stipulate 'the precise terms of that wedding service should have to be used in every case'. This would be an ineffective way of avoiding sham marriages given that there would invariably be some form of marriage service once officiants are appointed. Focusing organisation's beliefs about marriage seems to be an unnecessary and inappropriate imposition which goes against the Law Commission's insistence that the focus is now on officiants not organisations: determining whether an organisation has a belief about marriage could require the General Register Office to get into theological and doctrinal issues.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

The paper notes that 'while there is no specific exclusion of such groups under the current law, we understand that the General Register Office takes the view that it would be able to refuse to register the buildings of such groups for weddings, in the event that any applied' (para 5.100). It is unclear why this would need to be explicitly laid out in the case of bodies nominating individuals rather than bodies registering buildings. Making such an imposition again suggests that the Law Commission's schema is focused on organisations rather than officiants.

This and the other two proposed requirements discussed above in question 25 show the inadequacy of the definition of belief provided and risk providing a very low threshold of what would constitute a religion or belief. The inadequate definition of belief and the low threshold imposed would also open the floodgates. The definition already found in section 14 of the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013 would be preferable and would provide some protection against beliefs being created solely to be included under the legislation. Alternatively, it may be questioned why nominating organisations should be limited to religion or belief organisations. The terms of reference discouraged the Law Commission from engaging with this question: they were tasked to create a system which could include non-religious belief and independent celebrant ceremonies and so did not consider a more expansive scheme. The Law Commission were prevented from discussing why non-religious belief and independent celebrant ceremonies should be included and where the line ought to be drawn.

Consultation Question 29:

Please expand on your answer:

I agree with this provision but think that it should be used sparingly, as discussed above.

Depending on how strict the requirements proposed turn out to be and how they are enforced they could either place a significant burden on registration officials or open the door to all kinds of celebrants which would have the effect of making the third category redundant, on the basis that if anyone could apply to be an independent officiant then there is no reason to limit nominating organisations to religion or belief organisations. There is also the question of why independent celebrants cannot be covered by the third category. The Law Commission rules this out simply on the basis that they 'are not aware of any jurisdiction in which celebrants can be nominated by a body that is neither a religious organisation nor a non-religious belief organisation' (para 5.139). The Law Commission concluded that:

'While there are organisations such as the Wedding Celebrancy Commission that could potentially act as a nominating body, allowing an organisation that was not a religious or belief organisation to nominate officiants would undermine the very point of having definitions of religion or belief and detract from the recognition of those organisations. In addition, not all independent celebrants are affiliated to an organization, and it might be a contradiction in terms to require an “independent” celebrant to be a part of an organisation’.

The first reason given is diluted, however, by the inadequacy of the definitions of religion or belief discussed above. Given the difficulties of defining religion or belief, it may be preferable to open the definition to all organisations. Recognising independent celebrants without them even being a member of an organisation will already cross this line. Individuals will be able to solemnise marriages who are neither State employees nor representatives of religion or belief organisations. The Law Commission's fourth category is a pure example of an officiant-focussed approach and it leaves the third category looking quaint by comparison. It is likely that this fourth category will prove to be very popular. Indeed, if independent celebrants can go straight to the General Register Office then it could be asked, why should religion or belief officiants be denied that opportunity and be required to operate through their organisation and so be subject to further regulation concerning their organisation rather than themselves? Why should a religious leader of a faith of just nineteen members be denied the right to solemnise marriages while an independent celebrant who represents just themselves has that power?

In relation to the second reason (that some independent celebrants are truly independent), the paper does consider whether independent celebrants should be members of a professional organisation providing insurance or whether they should be required to take out insurance. It concludes that while being a member of a recognised trade body should not be a legal requirement, it ‘may help officiants to access the necessary training and continuing professional development’ (para 5.170). Similarly, it concludes that taking out individual insurance should not be a prerequisite but that ‘it seems a matter of good practice and professionalism to obtain such insurance’ (paras 5.171, 5.172). The fact that both the Association of Independent Celebrants and the Wedding Celebrancy Commission have such requirements suggests that there may be more scope for independent officiants to fall under the third heading, provided that nominated officiants are not limited only to religion or belief organisations. Indeed, if independent celebrants fell under the third heading then concerns about insurance would not arise and so it would be preferable for independent celebrants who are members of umbrella organisations to apply through their organisations. Stephanie Pywell's empirical research found that only 14% of her respondents were not members of a larger group. However, this is likely to be an underestimate of the number of truly independent celebrants, given her methodology which used the umbrella organisations as the point of contact (with one exception). It follows that there will be a minority of independent celebrants who do not belong to an umbrella organisation who could serve as the nominating body for the purpose of the third type of officiant. However, the lack of supervision might give reason not to include them. Even if they are to be included, that does not preclude the majority of independent celebrants being included under the third rather than fourth type of officiant, which would bolster the role of the umbrella organisation and reduce the burden and discretion placed upon the General Register Office or Registrar General. Indeed, the proposals to relax the rule on the use of religious content at civil weddings is likely to have the effect of reducing the number of independent celebrant ceremonies on the basis that Pywell's research suggests that their popularity arises from the way in which they alone at the moment can blend religious and non-religious content.

The Paper is correct to say that ‘this would go a long way towards addressing the key problem of religious-only marriages, where some individuals do not realise what is required and are left without any remedy at the end of a lengthy relationship’(para 10.63).

It is noticeable, however, that this would have made no direct difference to the outcome of Akhter v Khan. If the underlying principle is that unregistered marriages are of concern where there has not been a free and informed choice to opt out of legal protection then the Law Commission’s proposals will not go far enough. Their proposals mean that those who believe that the person officiating at the ceremony is authorised to solemnize a legal marriage will have a void marriage and be entitled to legal redress but this will not apply to those who have been promised a legally binding ceremony at some point (the Akhter v Khan situation) or where one party has been put under pressure by the other party not to have a legally binding ceremony. The current position that a marriage would be voidable where consent had been vitiated by duress, mistake, impaired mental capacity or similar other factors would remain unchanged but might not cover these situations (and did not cover the situation in Akhter v Khan ).

There is no doubt, however, that the system put forward by the Law Commission continues to be complex as shown by the fact that they seek to explain it using both a table and a diagram. However, an alternative way of conceptualising the proposals would be to say that the status of the marriage depends on the answers to three questions: (1) Have both parties given notice? (2) Have both parties given consent? (3) Do both or one of the parties believe that the officiant is authorised?

The Law Commission’s call to codify and simplify the law on validity should therefore be followed. The law as it currently stands is inconsistent and unprincipled. Rules on validity need to apply across all purported marriages. Yet, there is a need to go further than the Law Commission’s proposals.

A preferable approach would be to further simplify the law to require three elements for a valid marriage. A valid marriage will exist where both of the parties (1) give notice before the wedding, (2) believe that there is an authorised officiant at the wedding and (3) express consent at the wedding. A void marriage will exist where either (1) or (2) have not been met but the other two requirements have been met. A non-qualifying marriage will exist where (3) is not met and / or where both (1) and (2) have not been met. A marriage will be voidable where the consent is vitiated by duress, mistake, impaired mental capacity or similar other factors.

In particular, contrary to the Law Commission’s proposals, it should not be a valid marriage where only one of the parties believes that there is an authorised officiant at the wedding. The Law Commission suggest that such a marriage should be valid in order to protect the duped spouse. However, sufficient protection would be given if such a marriage was declared void.

Consultation Question 61:

When read in the context of the consultation paper as a whole, it is clear that this criminal offence proposal is a backstop which would simply prohibit officiants and pseudo-officiants from making misrepresentations. It would do nothing to give redress to the couple themselves. However, the risk in making such a recommendation is that the proposed criminal offence could be seen as a magic bullet solution (as the Independent Review and others saw similar offences). That is not what the Law Commission is proposing but on a glance of their proposals it is possible to erroneously assume this. It is vital that their proposed criminal offence is not seen in that way and not detached from the other proposals which will make much more of a difference.

The Law Commission contends that their proposed offence would 'reduce the likelihood of either of the couple being misled as to the nature of the ceremony and is 'intended to deter individuals from purporting to officiate at weddings when they are not authorised to do so' (para 10.188). These aims are laudable and logical in so far as it removes a possible gap in the law; though it may be questioned whether general criminal offences such as those found in the Fraud Act 2006 already criminalise such behaviour.

Moreover, the reference to deterring individuals from purporting to officiate shows that this proposed offence suffers from the same defect as the offence suggested in the Independent Review. There is no evidence to suggest that the problem of unregistered religious marriages is mainly attributable to rogue celebrants. Creating and clarifying the legal responsibilities of officiants, as the Law Commission suggests, will help to mitigate the number of unregistered religious marriages and will arguably do enough to get any rogue celebrants in line without the threat of criminal sanction. Such a possibility of criminal sanction will have a limited effect on the problem of unregistered religious marriages.

Recommending the enactment of new criminal offences should therefore be undertaken lightly since there is a risk that such provisions will be focused upon and erroneously seen as 'the answer'. Moreover, it is often the case that many proposed new criminal offences would penalise behaviour that is already a criminal offence. This means that rather than suggesting that a new criminal offence is created, it would be preferable to amend existing criminal offences to make it clear that they apply to the situations that need to be criminalised. There are three such amendments that need to be made. It could be argued that at least some of these are at most clarifications in that the situation is already probably covered by the existing offence. The need for an amendment could therefore be questioned. However, for clarity, it would be preferable that this was explicitly laid out, whether in a new law or by amending the original criminal provisions. The three amendments are as follows:

(1) Forced Marriages

Under section 121(1) of the Antisocial Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014, it is an offence in England and Wales for a defendant to use violence, threats or any other form of coercion for the purpose of causing another person to enter into a marriage where the defendant believes, or ought reasonably to believe, that the conduct may cause the other person to enter into the marriage without free and full consent. The defendant's actions need not be directed at the victim (s121(6)). Under section 121(2), where the victim lacks capacity to consent (as defined under the Mental Capacity Act 2005) the offence is 'capable of being committed by any conduct carried out for the purpose of causing the victim to enter into a marriage (whether or not the conduct amounts to violence, threats or any other form coercion)'. Under section 121(3), it is an offence where the defendant practises any form of deception with the intention of causing another person to leave the United Kingdom, and intends the other person to be subjected to conduct outside the United Kingdom that would be an offence under section 121(1) or would have been so had the victim been in England and Wales.

Section 121(4) states that "“marriage” means any religious or civil ceremony of marriage (whether or not legally binding)", providing rare statutory recognition of non-qualifying marriages. The Law Commission consultation paper noted that this means that 'forcing someone into a religious-only marriage is potentially a criminal offence'. However, they noted that there would be 'no implications for the status of the marriage' and that the existence of the provision therefore does not 'provide much assistance in deciding when a religious-only ceremony should be recognised for the purpose of financial provision'. This is true. Providing a remedy on relationship breakdown is not the purpose of the offence. However, this does not mean that the offence cannot be useful in terms of discouraging and prohibiting the use of violence, threats or any other coercion to cause another person to enter into a marriage. The offence as drafted clearly criminalises the situation where one party is forced into a civil or religious marriage ceremony. It would not, however, seem to cover the situation where someone is forced not to have a civil wedding ceremony.

(2) Coercive Control

Under section 76(1) of the Serious Crime Act 2015, it is an offence for a person (A) to repeatedly or continuously engage in behaviour towards another person (B) that is controlling or coercive, where at the time of the behaviour A and B are personally connected, the behaviour has a serious effect on B, and A knows or ought to know that the behaviour will have a serious effect on B. Section 76(2) states that A and B are personally connected if they are in 'an intimate personal relationship' or if they live together and are members of the same family or have previously been in an intimate personal relationship with each other. Under section 76(4), behaviour is deemed to have a 'serious effect' on B if it causes B to fear, on at least two occasions, that violence will be used against B, or it causes B serious alarm or distress which has a substantial adverse effect on B's usual day-to-day activities. It is a defence under section 76(8) if it can be shown that in engaging in the behaviour in question, A believed that he or she was acting in B's best interests and the behaviour was in all the circumstances reasonable. This does not apply in relation to behaviour that causes B to fear that violence will be used against B. This defence will apply if the contrary is not proved beyond reasonable doubt.

Section 76(6) states that A and B are members of the same family if they are, or have been, married to each other; they are, or have been, civil partners of each other; they are relatives; they have agreed to marry one another; they have entered into a civil partnership agreement; they are both parents of the same child; or they have, or have had, parental responsibility for the same child. The provision in section 121(4) of the Antisocial Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014 which makes it clear that marriage for this purpose includes any marriage ceremony whether or not it is legally binding could be helpfully duplicated here.

This offence can complement the law on forced marriage by articulating what constitutes coercive behaviour in intimate adult relationships. It can also be of use in terms of discouraging such behaviour. This offence has already been used in the context of religious marriages. In January 2020 it was reported that a Jewish wife had launched a private prosecution under section 76 of the Serious Crime Act 2015 against her ex-husband who denied her a religious divorce (a get). The judge accepted an application for the State to fund prosecution costs but the case was discontinued after the ex-husband gave the get. The fact that the prosecution did not go ahead means that it is unknown whether this action or one like it would be successful (and whether it would apply to religious-only marriages)

(3) Fraud

The offences discussed so far would criminalise the situation where the defendant forces or coerces the claimant to enter into a non-qualifying marriage. Yet, in the debate on the problem of unregistered religious marriages, more attention has been afforded to the perceived need to criminalise the actions of the celebrant (or officiant under the Law Commission's schema). For some, there is a need to criminalise all religious marriages that take place without or before a marriage following the requirements of the Marriage Act 1949 take place. However, not only would this criminalise unregistered religious marriages that take place voluntarily but it would also criminalise other marriage ceremonies that currently take place that are not under the Marriage Act 1949 such as those by humanist and independent celebrants.

The Law Commission's paper is particularly useful in articulating the gap where an offence might be needed. Such an offence, however, is already covered by the provisions of the Fraud Act 2006. Section 2 provides for the offence of fraud by false representation. This applies where the defendant dishonestly makes a false representation, and intends, by making the representation to make a gain for himself or another, or to cause loss to another or to expose another to a risk of loss. This could cover the situation where the defendant either is an officiant or purports to be an officiant and dishonestly makes a false representation as to the status or the effect of the ceremony intending to make a gain for himself or another, or to cause loss to another or to expose another to a risk of loss. It might be useful to clarify in any legislation seeking to deal with unregistered religious marriage that this scenario would be covered by the law on fraud. Such an approach would also reduce the risk that recommendations relating to new criminal offences are seen as the main or only solution to the issue.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

It is difficult to dispute that the law on marriage in England and Wales is antiquated and in need of reform. English and Welsh marriage law is inconsistent, unprincipled and discriminatory. It not only stipulates different rules for different religious groups but also excludes certain religious and non-religious practices. The law singles out marriages according to the rites of the Church of England, the Society of Friends and Jews. All other religious marriages must take place in a registered building in order to be legally recognised, therefore excluding groups who either do not have such buildings or whose traditions involve marriage ceremonies elsewhere such as outside, in the home or at a community venue. Couples who enter into these so-called 'unregistered religious marriages' (that is, religious marriages that do not comply with the requirements of marriage law) lack legal redress on relationship breakdown or death of a partner and so can only make use of religious tribunals such as Sharia Councils. They are in the same legal position as cohabitants.

This has been borne out by academic research, including my own work. Empirical studies conducted have highlighted the problem of unregistered religious marriages. For instance, the 'Social Cohesion and Civil Law' project conducted at Cardiff University found that over half of the cases dealt with by the Sharia Council in the study involved couples who did not have legally binding marriages. The research expressed concern that such litigants have very limited remedies under English civil law on relationship breakdown and that they often did not realise that this was the case: they assumed that their religious marriage had legal effect under State law. It also pointed out that whilst those who had legally binding marriages had a choice of remedies on relationship breakdown in that they could use State law or the Sharia Council, those in unregistered religious marriages either had to resolve the issues themselves or use the Sharia Council. This lack of choice is problematic given that other commentators have pointed to discrimination on grounds of gender that occurs within religious tribunals.

Reform of the law is needed because a number of wedding ceremonies currently take place outside the legal framework. Many of the couples who have such ceremonies consider themselves married at the end of it but they are only married in the eyes of the law (and benefit from the legal rights that come with marriage) once they undergo a further ceremony in the register office. This includes not only unregistered religious marriages but also ceremonies by non-religious bodies and celebrants: Humanists UK alone conducts around 1,000 ceremonies a year and a recent study estimated that independent celebrants conduct 10,000 ceremonies a year in England and Wales, but these ceremonies are also not currently legally binding.

Reform is needed to deal with these issues. In relation to non-religious marriages, there is a need to give marriages conducted by belief organisations and independent celebrants legal effect. However, if ceremonies by independent celebrants are made legally binding then there is no reason to restrict the organisations who can conduct weddings to religious or belief organisations. In relation to unregistered religious marriages, a step forward would be provided by removing the obstacles which currently indirectly discriminate against some religious groups by insisting that such marriages must take place in a place of religious worship and use prescribed words in order to be legally binding in their own right. This would be likely to reduce the numbers of unregistered religious marriages. However, such marriages are not always problematic. Where they result from a free and deliberate choice then the decision not to comply with legal formalities should be respected. Banning such marriages, requiring that they always follow a legal ceremony or penalising those who conduct such ceremonies would therefore be inappropriate and counterproductive, forcing such unions further into the shadows.

However, this does not mean that there is no role for English law. Legal redress should be provided to those in unregistered religious marriages where the failure to comply with registration requirements is unwitting or is not truly voluntary on the part of one of the parties. Education and awareness raising has an important part to play here but this would be aided considerably if the legal framework was accessible and principled. And ultimately there is a role for law here in terms of providing backstops whereby some redress can be given to those who unwittingly or involuntarily enter into unregistered religious marriages. Reform of the law of validity to make some unregistered religious marriages void could provide such a backstop and there is a limited role for some criminal offences. However, the most important backstop that could be provided is by providing some limited cohabitation rights of the type that exist in neighbouring jurisdictions

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

I have no views on costs other than that there ought to be consistency. The necessity and costs of having a separate, legally recognised marriage is one reason why reform is needed to remove the indirectly discriminatory provisions currently found in the Marriage Act.

Several calls for reform have acted on the presumption that unregistered religious marriages are problematic per se. They have sought to ban all unregistered religious marriages by prohibiting religious ceremonies that occur before legal ceremonies and / or by penalising those who conduct them. I do not agree with such an approach. Unregistered religious marriages can lead to discrimination, disadvantage and suffering – and there is a need for legal redress to be provided in such situations. However, this is not always the case. There are various reasons why people enter into unregistered religious marriages. Some enter into religious marriages so that they can date. It allows them to be together without being chaperoned. A legally binding marriage would be inappropriate and premature. For others, however, the unregistered religious marriage may be caused by the strictness of current marriage laws with couples unable to have the ceremony that manifests their beliefs under the legal restrictions meaning that a separate legal ceremony is needed afterwards and may never occur. For some, the unregistered religious marriage exists because of an unawareness that such a ceremony is not legally binding. And for some, there is pressure or coercion to only undergo an unregistered religious marriage ceremony.

Unregistered religious marriages are not a problem where they are entered into wittingly and voluntarily. Autonomous and freely informed adults should be free to voluntarily enter into any intimate relationships that wish to. There is an argument that legal redress might need to be provided if that relationship changes over time in a way that causes a detriment to one of the parties: if one gives up work or goes part time to look after children or the other party, for instance. But other than that, if the unregistered religious marriage results from a free choice by both of the parties then that should be respected.

I would argue that legal change is needed to reflect two points of principle. The first is that legal redress should be provided to those in unregistered religious marriages but only where the failure to comply with registration requirements is unwitting or is not truly voluntary by one of the parties. The second is that non-religious ceremonies (such as those conducted by humanist organisations) and ceremonies conducted by independent celebrants should be legally binding.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

Although this submission has expressed concern at the details, especially concerning the definition of belief, whether organisations other than religion or belief organisations should be included and whether differential treatment of independent celebrants is sound, the Law Commission's radical and comprehensive proposals would provide a solution to the concerns expressed about the current non-recognition of non-religious marriages. The general direction of travel proposed and the changes to preliminaries, ceremony and location are sound and much-needed.

These proposals also have a significant effect upon decreasing the number of unregistered religious marriages. The proposed changes as to validity, though still perhaps overly complex, would also help to achieve this, increasing the circumstances where weddings that are not legally recognised will be void rather than non-qualifying with the result that financial relief can be then provided on the breakdown. And the proposed criminal offence would support and enhance the officiant-focus but would do little to redress the problem of unregistered religious marriages. Overall, the Law Commission's proposals do not provide a singular magic bullet solution but a number of changes which individually and cumulatively would provide a significant degree of mitigation of the problem. It will therefore be vital that their proposals are not interpreted as a menu of options to cherry pick from. The consultation paper could be clearer in underlining this, but it does recognise that the proposals suggested will mitigate rather than solve the unregistered marriage issue.

I think it will be vital that these reforms do not increase the costs for couples. If those who seek a non-religious or religious ceremony that does not comply with the Marriage Act no longer have to pay for a second ceremony then that will be a significant cut in their costs.

Should not be possible for someone to get married without being present at the wedding ceremony.

Couples should not depart from making the public declarations always considered foundational to the legal marriage ceremony, any other course would undermine the solemnity of the ceremony and deny the seriousness of the commitment being made.

The prescribed words are minimal and couples can add to them if required.

The use of specific phrases show that people freely consent to the lifetime commitment they are entering into.

Please expand on your answer:

I do not believe 20 is sufficiently large enough a number as this number could easily be raised by two "families" who wish to form their own "belief" system for the purpose of setting up a "marriage" organisation. The number should be based on the national size of any organisation, so a figure of 200 would be more realistic.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This would allow couples to be married without being present at the marriage ceremony, this removing "dignity and solemnity". Simply signing the marriage schedule is not enough. Also the prescribed words should not be removed, entering into marriage is a serious commitment recognised around the world by all mankind. It is not a game. To say a few words enshrined in law enhances the "dignity and solemnity" of the ceremony and shows commitment to the marriage.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This simply takes away from the seriousness of the commitment. It also removes any requirement of dignity and solemnity.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

How could a marriage ceremony in say McDonalds be deemed "dignified and solemn". Yes there is a need for certain exceptions, the person in hospital who cannot leave their bed and was due to be married, and is now facing end of life. The church who regularly meet in a school hall each Sunday. etc . But as to the group of friends dressed as chipmunks in the local cemetery, would this be dignified, I sincerely doubt it. There should of be prescribed requirements relating to venues, dignity, solemnity, safety, etc.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This depends upon the development. More and more "moral" law is being abandoned to "popular" law forced upon the general population. Just because the majority approve of a law does not mean that it is "right".

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

For one thing it is not asking too much that some specific phrases are used to show that both persons freely consent to a lifetime commitment.

Marriage is an important institution, the bedrock of society, it should not be possible to enter into this solemn arrangement by being absent from the ceremony itself.

If these proposals are followed either member of the couple will be permitted to stay silent or say anything the like which will undermine commitment. In court, or any other swearing-in ceremony are people allowed to say nothing or gabble on? No! So why should marriage be different? This is not just a private contract between two persons but a contract with society at large and should be treated as such.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A wedding is a public declaration in which society and the state have an interest, it should not be left to private individuals to pick and choose. It is a serious and lifetime commitment and should be treated as such.

Consultation Question 44:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 45:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If you want a civil ceremony, that is what you should have. If your Faith is important and you want a ceremony that takes this into account this should be so. You should not be able to pick and mix. You can't sit on the fence.

Please share your views below:

None at all. Individuals have to make a choice. They should not be able to pick and mix.

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No. Not unless this takes the form of a blessing, as a result of the couple having recognised that their wedding is lacking something by not including God in it.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is an invitation to forced marriage which is becoming more common.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Venues should not simply be allowed because marrying couples want them, but because they are appropriate places to hold such solemn events. This proposal is another way of chipping away at the seriousness of the institution of marriage and more likely that those that use them feel they can get out of a lifetime contract with the slightest excuse.

Please share your views below:

None for reasons above. The seriousness of the ceremony is being downgraded.
Would we like to see the Queen coronated on a barge on the Thames?

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Why. What is there to hide?

Consultation Question 50:

Yes

Yes

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Why would they want to? Civil = non religious, and vice versa. Make your choice and stick with it. You should not pick and mix.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is allowing the wedding to take place anywhere. For reasons explained above this belittles and downgrades the importance of marriage both for society and the individuals concerned.

Consultation Question 52:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is very vague. One person's idea of dignified could be completely different from another's. There should be far greater guidance as to what this means.

There is a historical basis of the CofE being the foundational church in the UK. Any change opens up the situation to a free-for-all with potentially wrong people and wrong doing being perpetrated.

Consultation Question 24:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Secular organisations do not generally believe in an after-life where the soul will or will not reside with God. So, although they may bring some temporal comfort to followers, they do not offer a public benefit of guidance on how to live at peace with assurance from the moment of faith until death, nor the assurance to know that after death their souls are in communion with God in his presence.

Jesus's birth, death and resurrection are historical facts to substantiate this. What compelling facts do secular organisations offer?

Please expand on your answer:

How do I know that the GRO will not become a free-for-all liberal establishment with very poor guidance.

All weddings should ensure that the solemnity and dignity of this union are properly reflected in all aspects of the service ...ie: location, proper recognition and approvals, proper persons to officiate etc ..

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No one should get married without being at the service. Simply signing a piece of paper undermines the solemnity of the union

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There is a seriousness about a wedding service which should be reflected in how it is conducted. There are public and state interests about the future union which again should be reflected in the manner of the service. Allowing couples to pick and choose what goes on could end up with Disneyland approaches to what is meant to have serious implications and consequences in law (tax, inheritance etc...).

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

Marriage reflects a firm commitment by the couple to love and care for each other.

I don't see the current law discouraging that. If it does, then one questions the extent of the commitment.

Your proposals do not reflect the need for solemnity, dignity, public awareness, commitment etc... Therefore you are proposing a diminished form of marriage.

The objective may be to see more marriages but not just for the sake of it with an "anything goes" attitude.

The current process is important because if it cements the commitment more firmly, then societal benefits improve eg: long lasting, happy marriages; securer and better environment for children to grow up in; example to other couples; reduction in victim support homes, separations, divorce, abandonment; avoidance of disinheritance in common law partnerships etc...

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

Costs are not the issue in church or registry office weddings. Consider how much is spent on all the other wedding costs.

In church weddings many clergy have the approval of the PCC to discount some costs depending on the poverty of the couple in question.

The problem is that while a church may, if judged, reduce some costs, the state via the registry office is hampered by its inflexibility. That's where the problem lies.

Most churches require at least 6 months attendance at the marrying church (if not already members of the congregation). The reason is to reflect the sacred nature of this commitment and the seriousness with which the couple should view it.

So if travelling from elsewhere and not fulfilling this requirement, the only other dispensation is that they have a strong association with the church by other means eg: grandparents, parents married there; baptised there etc..

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

We have not been able to attend the one wedding to which we were invited!

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is important that the marriage parties are known locally and are committed to the marriage by submitting valid and local addresses.

Consultation Question 5:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The place of marriage in the UK society is so important that the notice to marry should require the parties to attend for registration

Consultation Question 6:

another period of time.

Please expand on your answer:

The period should be 14 days so that the whole marriage activity can be taken seriously and responsibly.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

The interview should be face to face so that the seriousness of the parties can be established. This would also give the chance to identify a possible sham marriage.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

For any party not living in the UK the party not in the UK should visit a recognised legal professional to establish their right to marry a person from the UK. Where both live in the UK they should, together, visit the registrations office together.

Consultation Question 9:

No

Please expand on your answer:

They should also be posted in the local 'office'.

Consultation Question 10:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 11:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The celebrant should be recognised by the Registrar as licenced to officiate

Consultation Question 12:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

That is a reasonable point but the answer above must apply!

Please share your views below:

They should be confined to the current marriage only.

Consultation Question 13:

No

Please expand on your answer:

As long as the notice of the wedding is posted in the local Registration Office

Consultation Question 14:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

They should be published in the churches closest to the home addresses of the two persons getting married.

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

Yes the minister should see every relevant document that applies. He or she should personally meet the two persons intending to marry.

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

Yes they should.

Consultation Question 18:

all weddings should be preceded by civil preliminaries.

Please expand on your answer:

It is crucial that both covenanting parties understand the permanency of the marriage union

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The law must establish that the parties are serious and committed.

Consultation Question 20:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

To ensure that the law is obeyed.

Consultation Question 21:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

That is both reasonable and sensible

Consultation Question 22:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

They are also able to establish the seriousness of the parties.

Consultation Question 23:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

They are able to establish the character of the officiator

Consultation Question 24:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

It's important to establish their credentials

Please share your views below:

Yes there should be. It must be established that the non religious officiator has a right view of the permanency and commitment of marriage.

Consultation Question 25:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Yes, of course!

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

The officiant should be a recognised person of upright character and known for some time to the organisation

Consultation Question 28:

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 31:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

They should be required to undergo a vetting procedure carried out by the Registrar

Consultation Question 32:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

That is just and right. The officiant must be Registrar approved and known as a person of proven upright character.

Consultation Question 33:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

the seriousness of marriage demands this!

Consultation Question 34:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The celebrant should also ensure that the dignity and tone of the ceremony uphold the dignity and solemnity of marriage. This must not be 'watered down'.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 37:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It should be the task of the Registrar to do this.

Consultation Question 38:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 40:

No

Please expand on your answer:

They should be interviewed every two years to re-establish their trustworthiness.

Consultation Question 41:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It should not be possible for someone to get married if they are not present at the ceremony. Simply signing the document is not adequate. Couples would be able to say anything they liked and this would be a major departure from the public declarations that are key to marriage. There is already a large degree of flexibility in the ceremony.

It is important that the ceremony rightly reflects the seriousness of the agreements being made.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This ceremony must always be treated seriously and to allow people to choose their own form of words undermines the seriousness of what is happening.

The ceremony should always be held in an appropriate place that reflects the occasion.

Many of the places chosen by the two parties (in the sky, in a theme park, etc) can dilute the seriousness of the matter and do not do the matter justice.

Consultation Question 44:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Whoever conducts the ceremony must emphasise the seriousness of the matter being entered into and that marriage is for life.

Consultation Question 45:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Please share your views below:

Consultation Question 46:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Many wish to cement their marriage in a religious setting and this choice should remain.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Open Doors demonstrate the public nature of the wedding and allow all to raise objections in such are required.

Open Doors guard against forced marriage.

Removing this point encourages a false perception that marriage is a private matter without public commitment.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

They should be in recognised buildings that reflect the solemnity of the marriage vows.

Please share your views below:

Venues should not be permitted because the couple wants them. The marriage should be recognised as a lifelong commitment for the two parties.

A wedding in say, Macdonalds, would greatly devalue the wedding vows and seriousness of the matter.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

They should be publically accessible to all.

Consultation Question 50:

No

No

No

Please expand on your answer:

The venue should always recognise the seriousness of the lifetime relationship being entered into.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It should always be held in a recognised building.

Consultation Question 52:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The local registrar must authorise the location to ensure that it is suitable.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Always

Consultation Question 53:

Chapter 8: Registration

Consultation Question 54:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This should all be done at the time of the ceremony with the parties and the witnesses present.

Consultation Question 55:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This respects the nationality of the parties.

Consultation Question 56:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It should always be done manually and at the time of the ceremony

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I'm pleased that such a responsibility is recognised. However, such a duty is being limited to the conduct of the officiant; I'm also very concerned about the content of the ceremony.

Marriage is fundamental to the welfare of society. What do the terms 'dignity' and 'solemnity' actually mean? What precisely is necessary for a marriage ceremony to have dignity? What makes such a ceremony a solemn occasion?

Needless to say, before marriage was redefined it was clear that the dignity and solemnity of marriage found their meaning in the Person of God!

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There is already a large amount of flexibility permitted in a wedding ceremony. Having attended the wedding of my daughter just eighteen months ago I am aware of how minimalistic the prescribed words are. I don't think that it is very much to expect of both partners that they should use previously specified phrases in order to confirm each person's consent to commitment for life.

I am most certainly not in favour of making possible the absence of either partner from the wedding ceremony! This detracts from the public testimony that is being given. Witnesses need to hear both of them making their vows that clearly indicate the commitment they are making, using words that are not simply whatever they choose, but prescribed words that denote the dignity and solemnity of the covenant which they are making with each other.

More than this, a wedding is never just about the couple! The union in which they are entering is a union which society understands and which has been defined legally. To allow a couple to define the wedding ceremony decouples that marriage both from the law and from the wider society. Marriage is never a private matter!

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Again, the marriage ceremony is a serious and solemn occasion. As I've observed above, a wedding is a public declaration. Both the state and society have a vested interest in it. Every aspect of the wedding ceremony ought to demonstrate dignity and solemnity.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Forced marriage is still a problem in our society. I'm very glad that the requirement was introduced centuries ago so that people - usually women - are protected from marrying against their will.

Furthermore, I have already emphasised that marriage is not a private matter; it has enormous public significance. "Open doors" reinforces the public nature of wedding declarations; the requirement should be kept.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This is a tricky question. Some churches don't own the buildings in which they meet, so allowing for a variety of venues would be of benefit to them. However, I am aware of many inappropriate settings (usually typified in fictitious weddings seen in the movies!). The marriage ceremony must be both dignified and solemn. How can a ceremony in a dungeon, or underwater, or at a Comic Book convention be deemed dignified and solemn?

Simply choosing a venue because the couple wants it is not wise.

Please share your views below:

Dignity and solemnity: how will these 'tests' be applied to a wedding 'in the air'?

Please expand on your answer:

Just as there is a lack of clarity as to how venues will be tested for 'dignity' and 'solemnity', so there is a lack of clarity as to how venues would be tested for 'safety'.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I think that stringent safeguards ought to be proposed rather than simply 'guidance' from the General Registry Office.

Not only should the venue be safe, but there must be safeguards around the content of the ceremony.

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

My fiancée and I have been trying to get married since March 2020. The requirement to give notice in person was the first hurdle, because our local register office was closed for several months. Because of that we weren't able to give notice until July, by which time the earliest available date to get married at the register office wasn't until November. We only wanted the minimum required ceremony to get legally married. With the additional lockdown that happened in November, our date had to be moved to December, and now with the Tier 4 restrictions it has been moved to January, although there is of course no guarantee that even this date will be viable. If the UK had marriage laws that were even remotely modern it's very likely that none of this would have happened - we could have given notice online (even the requirement to give notice *at all* is honestly antiquated, and many other places don't require you to do anything) and gotten married over the summer before any additional restrictions were put in place. In a worst-case scenario such as the one we're currently in, we could have got married via a video call or other remote option. It is truly embarrassing that the UK's marriage laws are so ancient.

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Why should it matter whether you live somewhere or not.

Consultation Question 5:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I agree that you should be able to start the process online, but as covid-19 has proven, the requirement to do *anything* in person should be abolished.

Consultation Question 6:

another period of time.

Please expand on your answer:

Zero days. What purpose could any arbitrary amount of time serve?

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

Yes, remote interviews should be the default.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

You should be able to give notice (if it's still to be required) from literally anywhere.

Consultation Question 9:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

No

No

Please expand on your answer:

there should be no legal restrictions at all, but of course religious venues may choose whether or not to conduct any ceremony they wish.

Consultation Question 51:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

if they don't want to perform the wedding there, then they're free to choose not to do so. the couple should equally be free to choose anyone else they want to officiate. a friend of the couple should be able to quickly and easily become authorised to conduct the wedding if they can't find anyone else willing to officiate (for example, if you wanted to get married on a mountain but existing officials didn't want to hike up there).

Consultation Question 52:

Yes

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

As a retired vicar, I took a C of E wedding in August 2020 under the then current rules. There were 30 present and no congregational singing. However, the rest was normal and it was a dignified yet fun, joyful occasion.

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

No

Please expand on your answer:

My long experience as a parish Vicar makes me concerned that this might leave it open to marriage fraud, especially relating to immigration.

Consultation Question 5:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The essential thing is the in-person interview.

Consultation Question 6:

another period of time.

Please expand on your answer:

3 or 7 days seems very rushed for such a huge, life changing decision. I would have thought that a month, at the very least, would be more appropriate.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

I am a great fan of technology and use it all the time. But I think, in view of concerns about coercion and immigration, an in-person interview should be mandatory in this case.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

If they are relevant nationals and attend an in-person interview, that should be fine.

Consultation Question 9:

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

Yes, I think banns are outdated and serve no real purpose any more.

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

I think, based on 21 years in C of E ordained ministry, that the current system for documentary evidence is sufficient and meeting each person separately would be excessively cumbersome for all concerned.

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

As common licences are fairly rare and for specific, unusual circumstances, I think both parties making separate declarations makes sense.

Consultation Question 18:

Anglican preliminaries should continue to be recognised as legal preliminaries to weddings officiated by the Church of England and the Church in Wales;
or

Please expand on your answer:

For all Christian believers a church wedding is essential, as the vows are made primarily in the presence of God himself. But for many others, a church wedding is also very important as the core marriage, not an add-on.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

I agree if unlawful, but I would be concerned about banning an organisation 'contrary to public policy or morality'. That is very undefined. Public morality seems to change all the time in all sorts of directions, and public policy would need a much tighter definition (perhaps restricted to the Law of the land).

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It sounds like anyone could apply! Too open and uncontrolled.

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

But that needs to be tightly defined for everyone's benefit and clarity, for example as set out in the next question.

Consultation Question 31:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I don't think that independent officiants are a good idea.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I think oral consent (unless a person is unable to speak, obviously), is essential. I also think that the current wording for both civil and church weddings should be kept. There is more than enough room to tailor things, whilst keeping the essential heart of what marriage is.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is very important and Las Vegas style weddings make a joke of something beautiful and massively significant for any functioning society. IT REALLY SHOULD NOT BE CHANGED ANY FURTHER!

Consultation Question 44:

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Only in a list of suitable indoor environemnts.

Please share your views below:

None of the above are suitable for a safe and dignified wedding ceremony.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Public access as a wedding, by most definitions, has an essential public element.

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This requirement assumes that people lead relatively static lives, which is not the case. The validity of their desire to marry (ie that there are no reasons why they should not) can be established by other means.

Consultation Question 5:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This is a far more sensible way of establishing that someone is legally free to marry.

Consultation Question 6:

seven days; or

Please expand on your answer:

It is reasonable to require the person to attend, in person, a meeting to verify that it is legally valid for them to marry a week ahead. This allows the registry office to have fair notice of any changes and the couple to "get it dealt with" ahead of the day itself.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

The better approach would be to require an in person meeting unless the participants can prove beyond reasonable doubt that there is no coercion or "sham" involved.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

This should continue.

Consultation Question 9:

Other

Consultation Question 12:

Yes

This is a matter for the Anglican church to respond to.

Consultation Question 14:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

Ideally, the banns should be published widely, so actually they should be published at all the offices and churches within, say, 40 miles, of the church which will hold the ceremony.

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

Agreed, but they should be provided with free access to the necessary authorities to check the information they are provided with.;

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

This is an essential part of the process.

Consultation Question 18:

Anglican preliminaries should continue to be recognised as legal preliminaries to weddings officiated by the Church of England and the Church in Wales;
or

Please expand on your answer:

There is no reason to abandon this option.

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

An officiant is a necessary part of a marriage process, as it makes it clear that a marriage is more than an agreement two people - it visually and practically marks that a marriage is part of society's structure.

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There is no reason to place this restriction. The current freedom of registration officers to officiate at other weddings allows for significant healthy diversity.

Consultation Question 21:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 22:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This is a matter for those churches respectively.

Consultation Question 23:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This will allow for the diversity which exists in the faith sector to be more fully expressed in marriage. However, it is essential that those who are chosen as officiants should be allowed, but not required, to marry those outside their faith or conscience.

Consultation Question 24:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Please share your views below:

A list seems reasonable, but I am not sufficiently informed to comment further.

Consultation Question 25:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The wedding service allowed should be agreed to be within the bounds of the law's definition of marriage. Ideally there would be some clear boundaries and text guidelines or options. There should be a clear path for the approval of the ceremony.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

This is risky in that it starts to allow government to define the bounds of religion. Better to stick to a clear definition of what the bounds of marriage are (as noted above) and require that ceremonies stick within that.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

Yes, makes sense.

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As long as, as noted above, these officiants are not required to officiate at weddings beyond their conscience, which is entirely for them to determine.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There are plenty of other means provided above.

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 31:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

But I note above that "independent" officiants is not an idea I agree with.

Consultation Question 32:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Furthermore, "elevating the making of profits" should be defined in clear, limiting terms. This needs much more clarity to make sure that it is enforceable.

Consultation Question 33:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is in direct conflict with the previous proposal. The "making of profits" should be much more clearly defined and this should limit the fees chargeable.

Consultation Question 34:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 35:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This is good, but very very weak. Both dignity and solemnity need strong, enforceable, definitions. Officiants should be required to make it clear through words, manner, and tone, that a legal ceremony is in progress.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Guidance is helpful; but it must
(a) enforce dignity and solemnity
(b) enshrine freedom of religion and conscience
(c) provide a clear framework and boundaries.

Consultation Question 37:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 38:

Consultation Question 40:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes in principle, but where people are officiants because of a post they hold, they should cease to be officiants should they leave that post.

Consultation Question 41:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This is a very loose requirement and impossible to agree with or disagree with. Far more clarity is needed before it is possible to comment on.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a profound legal, personal and societal agreement between two people. Therefore, it should not be possible for someone to get married without being present at the wedding ceremony. It removes the significant importance of the need for public declaration and would substantially downgrade, perhaps totally remove, the dignity and solemnity of the ceremony.

There already exists a great deal of flexibility in the ceremony and further flexibility is not needed. That a couple should be able to personalise a lot of their marriage is reasonable: they are getting married. But a marriage is also a legal and a societal agreement, and so it reasonable to require that those aspects are clearly included, through the use of prescribed wording (with appropriate variants).

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

As per previous comments:

Marriage is a profound legal, personal and societal agreement between two people. There already exists a great deal of flexibility in the ceremony and further flexibility is not needed. ### Consultation Question 45:

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There is no need for this provision to be removed. For many couples this freedom has allowed them to be married according to their consciences, and within the bounds of the law.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The actually wedding ceremony is relatively short, but it is essential that that part should be public because this is an agreement that goes beyond the couple getting married.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A marriage ceremony is a celebration, and it should be allowed to be that. But it is also a profoundly serious moment, and that should not be lost. Venues should be allowed only because they are appropriate places to hold such a significant ceremony. A clear definition of the dignity and solemnity describe above is crucial in determining venues.

A wider number of venues is a good thing, but they should be required to meet the need for dignity and solemnity, as well as celebration.

- Question 48 specifically asks about couples having ceremonies “in the air”, meaning the safe and dignified test doesn’t seem too hard to meet. Would weddings also be allowed in McDonald’s?
- Unofficial wedding ceremonies have taken place in an S&M dungeon, underwater, and at a Comic Book convention with a couple dressed as comic book heroes. It would be completely incompatible with the dignity of marriage for venues like these to host legal weddings.

Please share your views below:

There are no issues with three of those options, provided, as noted above, that dignity, solemnity are defined and required, as is public access, along with celebration!

"In the Air" is somewhat vague so impossible to comment on.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

See above.

Consultation Question 50:

Other

Other

Other

Please expand on your answer:

The question is not entirely clear, but, in principle on grounds of conscience for the venue owners, yes to all three. However, there must be freedom made for the many people who wish to get married but whose faith organisations have no direct access to a venue. Therefore there must be a category of venues which are neither "religious belief venues" nor "non-religious belief venues"

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

They should be allowed to approve a venue only with the clear bounds of dignity, solemnity etc, which need to be much more clearly defined than is proposed.

Consultation Question 52:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

But much much much more clarity is needed on these requirements to avoid farcical situations.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 53:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Please share your views below:

There should be a process of engagement between the venue (which should be allowed to define which types of wedding they are willing to host) and the registrars office leading to approval (or not). Again, clearly defined requirements should be set.

Chapter 8: Registration

Consultation Question 55:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Although I am sympathetic to the request for Welsh only, it would seem to me to make future administrative work harder for not much gain.

Consultation Question 56:

Please expand on your answer:

This should be brought as a separate proposal when it is fully developed.

Chapter 10: Validity and offences

Consultation Question 57:

Consultation Question 14:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

It depends on where the banns are allowed to be published

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

I think that they should be published at the church and also on an official website

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

I agree with both of the above. If someone wishes to marry in an Anglican church then this is the least that should be expected of them

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

I think that this is a good idea, as it helps to prevent marriage under duress

Consultation Question 18:

Anglican preliminaries should continue to be recognised as legal preliminaries to weddings officiated by the Church of England and the Church in Wales;
or

Please expand on your answer:

I do not believe that a separate civil ceremony is necessary for those marrying in an Anglican church

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I do not think this is necessary for a wedding in an Anglican church

Consultation Question 20:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Couples who belong to other denominations may wish to marry in their own church and so would need a registration officer present. This was the case for my own wedding.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

I cannot agree to this because public policy is an open-ended phrase and could depend on political beliefs., rather than ethical or moral considerations

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

This is the case in certain religious denominations but their ministers undergo a vigorous selection and training procedure. I think that all officiant should be trained, and not just allowed to officiate by virtue of their office.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The parties need to both be present at the ceremony and to express their consent verbally, unless physical disability prevents this. I think there should be some recognised statement of consent. Allowing any form of stated consent risks undermining the dignity and seriousness of marriage.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Allowing a couple to choose any form and ceremony again risks the undermining of the seriousness and solemnity of marriage.

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I believe that this should still be allowed for those who wish it, although the religious ceremony would not have any legal standing.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The 'open doors' requirement emphasise the public nature of the marriage and mitigates against a forced marriage which a closed, private ceremony would not. Removing this requirement encourages the view that marriage is a private ceremony with no public significance

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Only if the location allows a dignified ceremony that emphasises the seriousness of the commitment being undertaken outdoors,

Consultation Question 13:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Banns have to be read in the parishes of both parties. This would prevent a marriage by banns between parties only one of whom lives in England or Wales

Consultation Question 14:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I assume these rules are obsolete

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

The purpose of banns is to ensure that people who know the couple are aware , so that they can know if there are any impediments. If the couple live in different parishes, banns need to be read in both.

Consultation Question 24:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, in general agreement, but the definition is not strong enough to eliminate cults which may have beliefs inimical to our society. There have been a variety of such organisations in the USA, and i could envisage that organisations (such as ISIS or Boko Harum) could claim the status of religions. Other examples might be organisations advocating under age sex or FGM, or other processes or customs subjugating women.

Consultation Question 29:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The Government accepts responsibility for ensuring their suitability

Consultation Question 30:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

The government or the act or some other suitable independent body must define the term "Fit and Proper" carefully

Consultation Question 31:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

These requirements are necessary but not sufficient

Consultation Question 32:

Consultation Question 34:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 35:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

It is not clear what the bounds of Dignity and Solemnity are. The arrangements should be such as to make it clear that the participants are serious about their vows, that the vows are audible to the whole gathering, and in full view. Stunts such as getting married in a swimming pool, or while engaging in another activity such as parachuting or mountaineering which detract from the participants and guests paying full attention to the essentials of the wedding, should not be encouraged, as being neither dignified nor solemn. Expecting a trained owl to bring the rings can cause chaos if the owl fails to perform.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 37:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, but there should be a back-stop in case the organisation neglects this responsibility

Please expand on your answer:

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A Wedding is an event which is not only important to the participants, but also to society in general. It should therefore be seen to be done publicly. Even if legal documents are signed before or after the ceremony, the content of them should be made public by the participants in and during the ceremony, both verbally, ( I will, I take, I do ) and if appropriate by clearly seen acts (giving or exchanging rings or other symbols) or gestures (a kiss or embrace) , and this should be done in a place to which the general public has access for the duration of the ceremony.

Consultation Question 46:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Clearly the subsequent religious service is legally irrelevant to the couple's legal status, but may be otherwise important to the couple (eg baptism of existing offspring), so section 46 is unnecessary

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

See answer to Question 42

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Not all locations provide dignity and solemnity, nor do they allow the public witnessing of the event on inland waters such as lakes or rivers,, in the air, and/or, in private homes.

Please share your views below:

Outdoors, in a place accessible to the public could be OK. I don't think a small boat (punt?) would be suitable. Neither of the other suggestions allow public access

I agree that officiants should behave responsibly by upholding the dignity and solemnity of marriage, but I also believe that they should be held responsible to ensure that the tone and content of the legal ceremony upholds the dignity and solemnity of marriage. Making the ceremony a casual and flippant affair are not the standards to be aspired to.

The words 'dignity' and 'solemnity' need to be very clearly defined in order for the officiants to fully understand their responsibilities.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

To allow people to get married simply by signing the marriage schedule without needing to be present at the ceremony grossly undermines the seriousness and solemnity of the marriage ceremony and the commitment they are making to each other. Public declarations are foundational to the legal marriage ceremony. There is plenty of flexibility in the wording of the wedding ceremony so that couples can make it 'their own', so keeping specific phrases to show that the couple freely consent to making a lifetime commitment to one another will add to the 'feel good factor' of the ceremony, not detract from it. If they are allowed to completely personalise the ceremony then it becomes too private and completely detached from becoming a union which is understood by society and has been legally defined. Society and the law have an interest in the making of a public declaration. A wholly self-defined marriage ceremony divides marriage from the law and wider society.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The marriage ceremony is a serious and solemn occasion and therefore should be treated as such. Themed ceremonies such as Alice in Wonderland or Harry Potter are inappropriate and simply trivialise the ceremony. How can such trivialisation convey to the couple or society that the wedding vows convey a deep and long term commitment to one another?

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A clear unambiguous verbal (unless a participant is mute) statement of consent is needed with a minimum set form of words that is widely recognisable from previous weddings - a common currency of words, if you like. This should add to the solemnity of the occasion, and remind the couple and witnesses that this is not solely a private matter but one of public import (which is why the state and the law are involved) because a stable society is built on stable marriages.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A wedding should have due solemnity because of the seriousness of the commitment that is about to be undertaken. There should not be an 'anything goes' policy because a frivolous wedding denotes a frivolous view of marriage: lightly-undertaken, lightly broken. A marriage is not a private matter for the couple; everyone has a stake in a faithful, enduring marriage because such marriages provide emotional and material security for any children that result, and such children grow up to be responsible adults who contribute to society. Children from failed marriages and other arrangements are far more likely to be a burden on society through mental health, poor educational attainment, drug abuse, crime and poverty. Social research has shown this over and over again.

Consultation Question 47:

Please expand on your answer:

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The more individuality in the ceremony, the more the sense that couples are entering into a self-defined marriage, rather than the solemn undertaking of a lifelong covenant which should be common to all marriages. Wacky locations undermine the seriousness of what is being entered in to.

Please share your views below:

Outdoors in a garden of a hotel would be fine, but all the other settings above are highly inappropriate, the last one, a private home (unless one participant is seriously ill and unable to be moved) because of the public nature of marriage.

It is good for people to reflect on the commitment they are making, which is often easier in a place that is separate from the community. ## Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is not a case of just ticking boxes, we are referring to people of all types, that may be hard of hearing old or being pushed into a wedding! Care needs to be taken in all areas! It cannot be right to have such a cavalier way about a ceremony and to allow it to be abused or radicalised in any way people want! Which can happen from any organisation being allowed to be used in this way.

This is a dreadful example to give society on how little credence and care we give to marriage. It is necessary in a variety of ways to help people to understand commitment, for the well being of society, emotionally and for the benefit for their children and the future.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No I disagree, this is not good. It is a solemn occasion and it must be kept that way. It is not right to allow any wording to be applied. Marriage is a commitment and the ceremony must be kept special and not allowed to be politicalised by any group whoever they are. The place and the wording must be kept in a correct and significant way!

Consultation Question 53:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Please share your views below:

My view is that as in all these questions you seem to be happy to pass the responsibility quickly on to another party. Surely we should realise that as a society we require some things to be constant. Marriage and the way we handle the ceremony, who officiates and the location, should be defined as special and required to be kept that way. We are required to look after the environment and we do so by making sure we select and care about our refuse and recycle. We care, because this is looking after the health of our world! Let us look after the health in our society by caring about the way we take care of relationships and care about every aspect of marriage and the way it can have a positive or negative affect on society!

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

People get married quite easily at the present time, without us requiring any changes in the law. If marriage was given a better status by all side of society in benefits not only financially, but also in bringing up offspring. This would help people understand the real value of marriage.

The structure of marriage is one that allows a variety of different thoughts and feelings to support children in life, in a very balanced way! It has a creativity in it, allowing for the benefit of ideas and emotions to be shared, that can create a harmony peace and emotional balance that can supports society in so many ways.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

Cost is something we all cater for when working out expenses. If the cost is too high it will not benefit either party!

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

Once something is not given proper status, it becomes less important and people will not desire to have it. If on the other hand it is dignified and given status and looks special then people want it. As a law maker you can support society and help it to become a good society and one that values its people! If you just make laws for convenience and to sooth the ones in society who are after change, you do the people a disservice. We require good and healthy laws made by people who value not only the world we are in, but people and the future for those coming after us who will certainly judge all of us. All of which requires a lot of good thought and possibly a tinge of faith in humanity, life and possibly in much more!

This needs to be much broader, as officiants should have a wider responsibility to ensure the content and tone of the legal proceedings upholds the dignity and solemnity of marriage.

The definition of 'Dignity and solemnity' needs to be spelled out in detail, as this could be determined subjectively in a variety of ways.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Removing prescribed words and just requiring an expression of consent is totally inadequate. Someone could sign the statement and not actually be at the wedding!

Couples being able to say anything they like or nothing removes the solemnity and commitment of marriage. There is no need to depart from the public declarations foundational to the legal marriage ceremony.

The risks of undermining the solemnity of marriage and minimising the serious commitment of marriage will have a very negative effect on society. The current prescribed wording can be added to by couples in all kinds of ways so it is not necessary to change as the wedding service is already very flexible. This is change for the sake of change. If it is not broken, don't try to fix it!

It is not much to ask that some specific words are used to show that both people freely consent to the lifetime commitment they are entering into. Such words help couples express the commitment they wish to make to each other.

The desire to completely personalise the wording in a marriage service comes from a wrong view of marriage that is a union which is understood by society and has to be legally defined. Society and the law have an interest in the making of a public declaration. It would be wrong to decouple marriage from the law. This would be disastrous for society, please do not consider this.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A particular ceremony should not be allowed simply because the couple decide at that point in time to follow a certain format. This is a very significant event and so the marriage ceremony should be conducted as present with serious thought and solemnity.

Just being able to choose whatever you like in a ceremony has no bounds and shows a lack of understanding and view of what marriage is. All society has an interest in the public declaration of marriage and this should be common to all marriage ceremonies.

Themed weddings that are simply about being fun and outlandish are probably those where the couples have not truly reflected how seriously marriage should be taken.

Our country is better than this, please don't go down this regretful route.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The open doors requirement helps convey the public nature of wedding declarations and was introduced as a protection against forced marriages that unfortunately is still a problem in our society.

Removing the requirement encourages a false perception that marriage is a private matter without any public significance.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Venues should not simply be allowed because marrying couples want them, but because they are appropriate places to hold such a significant ceremony. Who determines what is dignified and safe? This will cause endless problems. Be careful not to legitimise inappropriate settings.

Consultation Question 22:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

And the same recognition should be given to ministers of other religious denominations.

Consultation Question 23:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

There is an important caveat to my 'yes' answer: it is not the jurisdiction of the law society to 'propose' or in any other way to determine the officiant in other religions (apart from the state church perhaps).

For non religious belief followers, they have the ability to use a civil wedding registrar. There should be no enabling of such organisations to nominate an officiant any more than any other type of non religious group, eg a rugby club, a nature group

Consultation Question 24:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It sounds like a religion. If not than the civil ceremony option is available to ensure the marriage conforms to the dignity and status expected.

Please share your views below:

It is for non religious belief organisations to justify why they should have any different entitlement to a civil marriage which is available to any other non religious citizen.

Consultation Question 25:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The number threshold for appointing officiants should be much higher, of the order of a minimum of 10,000 adherents when measured nationally.

A number as low as 20, which the law society proposes, would be an invitation to form sects.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Most definitely not. This would be gross interference and trespass into areas of conscience which is akin to totalitarianism.

Public policy and morality are subjective and very often partisan and the product of active lobbying by vested interests.

Such a proposal would unleash a virus of political correctness and be extremely corrosive to the interests of a harmonious society. It would risk causing division and persecution particularly of those who adhere to the prevailing and long-tested Judaeo-Christian precepts.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

Yes.

Consultation Question 28:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The religious organisations should be left to administer their own officiants without state interference or bureaucracy.

Non religious organisations should be subject to the same arrangements as civil registrars.

Consultation Question 29:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Provided they fulfil the same criteria and provide the same functions as a civil registrar

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes but caveated that 'fit and proper' is determined by the religious organisation

Consultation Question 31:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This should be decided by religious organisations for religious ministers. The above criteria for civil registrars are agreed except the minimum age should be 25 to ensure candidates had undertaken higher level studies and gained life experience to reinforce the dignity and solemnity of marriage.

Consultation Question 32:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is for religions to determine.

People can make their own choices about the motivation of religious officiants.

Consultation Question 33:

No

Please expand on your answer:

As above, this is for religious organisations to administer.

Consultation Question 34:

Consultation Question 40:

No

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This seems to suggest it would be possible for a person to get married without being physically present at the wedding ceremony. I believe this risks undermining the dignity and solemnity of the wedding ceremony as well as devaluing the serious nature of the promises and commitments being made. It seems to me there is a huge amount of freedom already within the wedding ceremony in that the legally binding words are minimal and couples can shape their vows in any number of ways.

It is important for couples to declare their intention to enter the lifetime commitment that marriage is.

A wedding is not just about the preference of the individuals involved, but it is a union which is understood by society and which has been legally defined - so both the general public and the law have an interest in there being a public declaration. A self-defined marriage completely undermines and devalues the 'dignity' or 'solemnity' of what marriage actually is - good for society and should be kept and celebrated as such.

Consultation Question 43:

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is not a party (although admittedly it is something to celebrate), it is a public declaration in which both society and the state have an interest. The promises made in marriage are serious and should not be taken flippantly or lightly and so settings or themes of weddings should reflect the dignity and solemnity of the occasion.

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a public matter and not a private one. As such the open doors requirement conveys this public nature of wedding declarations. There is also an issue of forced marriage in our society. An open doors requirement provides some limited protection from any who would be forced to marry against their will.

Consultation Question 48:

Please expand on your answer:

Venues need to be places that are both dignified and safe - in keeping with the solemn nature of marriage. Again, marriage is not a private matter, but a public matter, so it's not about what the individual couple want, but what is appropriate for such a hugely significant ceremony.

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Many churches rely on civil registrars to register weddings, as they do not have their own authorised person.

One of the Law Commission's goals is that "the ceremony that is meaningful to the couple should be recognised by law". This can happen at the moment in churches that do not have an authorised person, by having a civil registrar to register the marriage. If this is not possible, many couples who attend such churches are likely to require a civil ceremony separate to their church wedding.

Independent officiants currently conduct weddings that are not legally binding. These have included ceremonies underwater, in a sadomasochism dungeon, at a comic book convention with a couple dressed as fictional characters, and at a ruined leper hospital on Hallowe'en.<sup>1</sup> Another involved a couple dressed as hedgehogs.

Such ceremonies could be legally binding if independent officiants were allowed, undermining the dignity of marriage.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

The prescribed words form a foundation for the declarations that are required for a marriage. Without them the wedding ceremony can be as meaningless as a couple or officiant chooses, and legal marriage can become nothing more than a certificate from the Government.

The commitment made in marriage must be taken very seriously, and without the prescribed words it is much easier to treat the ceremony casually.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is far more important that a legal wedding ceremony reflects the seriousness of the commitment the parties are making than that it is personalised to the couple.

A requirement for officiants to ensure that the ceremony does not undermine the dignity and solemnity of marriage is too subjective. It will not prevent couples finding an officiant to agree to even the most outlandish wishes.

Please expand on your answer:

The 'open doors' requirement is a valuable part of wedding day celebrations, making it clear that marriage is not a private affair, but rather is important to society as a whole. Ensuring that weddings are open to any member of the public, rather than just those invited, is a way of protecting against forced marriage and bigamy, for example.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There is serious concern that it is unclear what safeguards will prevent unsuitable venues being used. How will the dignity of such ceremonies be guaranteed? The consultation states that venues would need to be 'dignified' and 'safe', but lacks precision on what this means or how it will be tested. Venues must not detract from the solemn occasion of the wedding.

Currently registration offices can also register weddings at a religious ceremony, where they oversee the signing of the register and ensure that the prescribed words are said. Many churches have civil registrars to officiate a weddings, but this proposal will prevent them doing so. “Contrary to public policy or morality” is too subjective an assessment. It would risk those with unpopular but entirely legal views being excluded from nominating officiants.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Currently, wedding officiants are either highly trained registrars or religious representatives who are likely to have strongly-held beliefs on marriage. Allowing independent officiants would open the door to those who may not place such a high value on marriage.

Currently there is no financial incentive to officiate a wedding. Opening up a market for independent officiants makes wedding vows a commercial concern. Those more willing to be flexible with the ceremony would be likely to profit the most, encouraging people to push the boundaries. This also risks defeating the goal of reducing costs of wedding venues, which was one of the stated aims the Government gave the Law Commission in 2018.<sup>2</sup>

A recent study found that most independent celebrants would give couples very little restriction in what they could include in their ceremony – even where the content “clashed with their personal religion, beliefs or values”. This sets the bar extremely low for the seriousness of the wedding, and it is unclear what safeguards or training would be in place.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The prescribed words form a foundation for the declarations that are required for a marriage. Without them the wedding ceremony can be as meaningless as a couple or officiant chooses, and legal marriage can become nothing more than a certificate from the Government.

Marriage is founded on solemn promises made between two parties. Under these proposals it would be possible to have a legally recognised wedding in which no words were said between the couple, let alone promises of any kind.

The commitment made in marriage must be taken very seriously, and without the prescribed words it is much easier to treat the ceremony casually.

The prescribed words are only a small part of the entire wedding ceremony. The rules are already extremely flexible about what happens in the rest of the ceremony. It is hard to imagine a genuine wedding in which the prescribed words could not be included at some stage.

Allowing wholly personalised wedding ceremonies without any legally-required words would send the message that marriage is an entirely private matter.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is far more important that a legal wedding ceremony reflects the seriousness of the commitment the parties are making than that it is personalised to the couple.

A requirement for officiants to ensure that the ceremony does not undermine the dignity and solemnity of marriage is too subjective. It will not prevent couples finding an officiant to agree to even the most outlandish wishes.

The possibility of fully-tailored wedding ceremonies will encourage commercialisation. Those more willing to be flexible with the ceremony would be likely to profit the most, encouraging people to push the boundaries.

If people can entirely customise their own weddings, they might blend together different elements from faith ceremonies inappropriately, effectively making a parody of those ceremonies. This could be highly offensive to people of those faiths.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

'Open doors' requirement is a valuable part of wedding day celebrations, making it clear that marriage is not a private affair, but rather is important to society as a whole.

The opposite is also important; weddings which are not publicly accessible make a statement that the marriage is private and of interest only to the couple. This couldn't be further from the truth.

Ensuring that weddings are open to any member of the public, rather than just those invited, is a way of protecting against forced marriage and bigamy, for example.

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The danger is that removing the restrictions opens the door to inappropriate venues being used. It is unclear what safeguards will prevent unsuitable venues being used.

How will the dignity of such ceremonies be guaranteed?

The consultation states that venues would need to be 'dignified' and 'safe', but lacks precision on what this means or how it will be tested. Venues must not detract from the solemn occasion of the wedding.

The Law Commission has made it clear it sees no objection to weddings "in the air", suggesting that the terms 'dignified' and 'safe' could be interpreted very broadly.

The danger is that removing the restrictions opens the door to inappropriate venues being used. It is unclear what safeguards will prevent unsuitable venues being used.

How will the dignity of such ceremonies be guaranteed?

The consultation states that venues would need to be 'dignified' and 'safe', but lacks precision on what this means or how it will be tested. Venues must not detract from the solemn occasion of the wedding.

The Law Commission has made it clear it sees no objection to weddings "in the air", suggesting that the terms 'dignified' and 'safe' could be interpreted very broadly.

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

The changes to maximum numbers and rules have been difficult to ensure the latest requirements are followed and a great frustration; it has been particularly harsh to have no options to include larger numbers in a large venue through obeying social distancing, masks, without guests singing etc., and follow all Government requirements. The couples I have dealt with were first and foremost determined to enter into their marriage contract as planned, even if the service had to be videoed for non-attendees.

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Given the centralised Government information on citizens with a right to remain in the UK, there should be no specific need to make the couple be resident in the district for 7 days.

However, there should still be the option for the minister / priest / leader to state that their particular tradition / religion does expect the couple to be part of that locality / parish - if the couple want to be married under that tradition / religion by a minister / priest / leader.

Consultation Question 5:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

It depends on the timescales for each part (the minimum notice period and the minimum time between the interview(s) and a marriage ceremony). I know getting my face-to-face interview with the both people together, before I agree to act as authorised officiant can be difficult to fit in to all diaries. Many couples will be extremely busy in the lead up to a wedding and if Law Commission starts an online, e.g. , 3-month minimum notice period, arranging the interview(s) might be too close to the planned wedding date due to lack of time to complete identity, immigration and background checks to prevent bogus marriages - or wreck plans if the Superintendent Registrar prevents the marriage proceeding on their booked date simply due to full diaries on their side.

Consultation Question 6:

another period of time.

Please expand on your answer:

I would recommend 1 month to allow the Superintendent Registrar sufficient time to complete identity and all other background checks etc. based on new evidence gleaned from an in-person interview or interviews.

Consideration should also be given to the benefit of having both people attend at the same time to both save Registrar's time and provide intuitive assessment of the validity of their intent.

Since we are confirming a long-term marriage with the expectation of stability, it is not unreasonable to expect 1 month to elapse, to ensure this is willingly entered into, fully considered by both and not rushed or coerced.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

I don't believe a telephone interview is sufficient to satisfy a Registrar that the person really is the person applying to marry, and that there is no force or coercion being applied. Whilst video interview may help with assessment of the validity, this should not exclude people who do not have access to video technology.

Much safer to stay with an in-person interview.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

Yes, giving notice should be an option online or by telephone if there is a good reason why they are not in the UK, but I would urge in-person interviews to be conducted (even with a UK-approved Registrar in a Commonwealth country) with sufficient time to validate prior to the wedding.

Consultation Question 9:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I am unclear as to exactly where these would be displayed online. If it is just a Government website, it may never be read by those who have a genuine reason to challenge one of the people giving notice.

Consultation Question 10:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This is the current practice and I see no reason to change this, but I would be content if there were reasons to shorten this to 6 months.

Consultation Question 11:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I expect some Government validation, registration and log of the officiant would be made - if there was any previous evidence of that person being involved in any bogus marriage challenge, this person could be prevented from continuing in that role.

Consultation Question 12:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If the Law Commission believe that the officiant performing the marriage should be listed to safeguard everyone involved, then allowing a last-minute switch would undermine this. Better to ask for a named backup officiant at the time of interview.

Please share your views below:

If the Law Commission believe that any officiant performing the marriage should be approved and known, to safeguard everyone involved, then allowing an unexpected switch to A N Other would undermine this. It is better to ask for a named backup officiant at the time of interview(s).

Consultation Question 13:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Banns are a local announcement and should relate to 1 of the 2 people marrying who have a local connection with the area / parish publishing the Banns. Primarily this should be for the Anglican Church to decide on the best way to validate and support the couple's notification of marriage.

Consultation Question 14:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Insufficient detail to assess the impact and/or reasoning behind this proposal.

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

Banns are a local announcement and should relate to 1 of the 2 people marrying who have a local connection with the parish publishing the Banns. Banns should be published in the parish of the Groom, the Bride and the wedding ceremony church (if not in either the Bride's or Groom's parish).

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

1. I believe the validation of identity, immigration, background checks etc. should be done by a Superintendent Registrar with full access to Government records. However any officiant or clergy should be able to raise concerns with the local Register Office about a proposed marriage.
2. Yes, definitely. I as an Authorised Person (local registrar) for a building ALWAYS meet the couple before I agree to sign the legal paperwork during the service.

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

I will assume when you say required to "attend", you mean an interview with the Anglican clergy (or similar priest) prior to the wedding.

I see no reason to make the declaration to the Anglican clergy (or Superintendent Registrar), since

- a) the legal background checks would attempt to discover this
- b) the declaration will be made during the service
- c) if one party is trying to hide an impediment they are not going to declare it freely.

Since the legal checks will have been made (as far as possible), the statement in the service is both a final declaration to their partner of their freedom to enter into the marriage and a significant verbal promise witnessed by officiant and the attendees - with the touching moment of asking anyone who has a reason to challenge this, to speak out now.

Consultation Question 18:

Anglican preliminaries should continue to be recognised as legal preliminaries to weddings officiated by the Church of England and the Church in Wales;
or

Please expand on your answer:

I know of some couples who have gone through marriage ceremony at the Register Office because their selected location could not be used for marriages but it is genuinely detracting from "the big day" if it is split and their "celebration" event with all their friends and family is a little while later. They feel that they are not properly committed / publicly recognised as married if they only have had the legal part. This similarly applies equally to other Christian denominations who will want to hold a single marriage service with a Registrar / Authorised Person for the building present to validate the legal promises and complete required paper record keeping.

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As an Authorised Person for our building, it works well because I can bring a personal touch to the wedding ceremony planning, as I can explain what the couple has to do for a legal marriage. Many people do select the traditional style wedding, with emphasis on a single big event. The ability to provide a legal document is certainly a meaningful part of the day. Knowing all the background checks have been done already removes concerns - we are seeking to promote good and stable marriages by offering support throughout.

Consultation Question 20:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Weddings based on religious ceremonies should continue to have an Authorised Person for the building validating the legal contract, that should be possible in a similar way for civil weddings, again with the constraint it has to be in a building registered for weddings.

Consultation Question 21:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Typically a wedding has a minister / priest / leader who conducts the ceremony, it is then good to have a registrar who undertakes the legal process. I am aware that Anglican ministers may fulfil both roles. No reason to change the current practice. No need for more than 1 registration officer if they are required to ensure a legal ceremony.

Consultation Question 22:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, but there should be registration of their names by the Superintendent Registrar and detailing the buildings they may use, with confirmation that sufficient training has been undertaken to issue legal documents,

Consultation Question 23:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Point 2 could be rather unconstrained, there should be controls such that "pop-up" organisations are not suddenly generated for a particular wedding, with no tradition of bringing marriage teachings and supporting the couple.

Consultation Question 24:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As above.

Please share your views below:

Generally assessing an organisation's claim to be a non-religious belief organisation is clear. A list of non-compliant organisations may include philosophical societies, scientific or academic institutions that have no single belief system held by their members and no inherent purpose to provide marriage services or support to members.

Consultation Question 25:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

20 members seems a very low threshold (noting that you require their governing body to authorise officiants).
Better to add a 5-10 year minimum existence to demonstrate the longevity of their beliefs, especially in relation to life-long marriage.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Today, some religious organisations elect to perform same-sex marriages, others only heterosexual marriages - I would not want an organisation to be excluded for not, for example, offering same-sex ceremonies - especially since same-sex couples do have other venues for their marriage.
At the opening of this consultations was concerns about non-legal marriages taking place and the lack of a legal framework for these. Certainly if an organisation allows or promotes non-legal marriages, polygamy, under-age or forced marriages that organisation appears unfit - noting that such practices may be deliberately hidden from public scrutiny.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

No. If the officiants have any part of a legal marriage ceremony, they should be registered individually and their credentials validated and some form of competency assessed.

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, officiants having any part of a legal marriage ceremony, should be registered individually by Superintendent Registrar , their credentials validated and some form of competency assessed.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The current system of officiants linked to the organisation, under whose ceremonies and belief system the service is carried out, is a positive aspect of the new start for the couple. Permitting independent business-driven officiants, from a generic list, who has little or no understanding of the organisation's traditions is an unwise move.

Consultation Question 30:

No

Please expand on your answer:

"Fit and Proper" is too open to interpretation. If the officiants have any part of a legal marriage ceremony, they should have their credentials (e.g. criminal record) validated and some form of competency assessed and be sponsored by the organisation they are attached to.

Consultation Question 31:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This is still too subjective about who and how they are deemed "fit and proper", much better to not allow business-driven commercial officiants, but have them attached to an owing organisation to whom they are accountable and whose ceremony and aims they carry out.

Consultation Question 32:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 33:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Autonomous independent officiants are not required, however I can envisage a role for a person at a registered building, e.g. a hotel, employing or selecting a member of staff, with training and registration, to undertake the role of officiant.

Consultation Question 34:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

An officiant should be tied to a single organisation, specifically to 1 or more authorised buildings, of that religious / non-religious / venue organisation.

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This is a legal contract being undertaken and the manner of the ceremony must convey this in accordance with the legal promises being made.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Some form of formal assessment should be considered, beyond hoping the person has read the guidance notes. Reinforced with prescribed sentences that are a legal minimum that would stand in court if ever challenged.

Consultation Question 37:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Beyond having unannounced OFSTED-like visits to a wedding ceremony, there are few ways of assessing the quality of an individual's work. It should remain with the organisation - this requires officiants be tied to a single organisation - thus removing any notion of autonomous independent officiants. Clearly if paperwork is not submitted correctly and on-time, the Superintendent Registrar would take action.

Consultation Question 38:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Please clarify exactly how the General Register Office would detect that a person is no longer a "fit and proper" person?

Consultation Question 39:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Autonomous independent officiants are not required. It should remain with the organisation - this requires officiants be tied to a single organisation - thus removing any notion of autonomous independent officiants. Exactly how would the General Register Office detect that a independent officiant s no longer a "fit and proper" person?

Consultation Question 40:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It would assist the overall quality of service and its management if there were 5-yearly confirmations that the organisation is still offering weddings and that the nominated individual is still sponsored by the organisation and active.

Consultation Question 41:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Autonomous independent officiants are not required.

Having officiants linked to a single organisation, validation of professional development remains with the organisation.

I doubt if the General Register Office is really going to have the time or mechanism to effectively assess any autonomous independent officiants.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

1. Yes, I agree but clarity needed about the need and role of a trained officiant / authorised person to ensure the expression of consent is legally sufficient, if it is not the 2 stipulated sentences used today.
2. No. In the religious tradition I represent the couple will often write their own vows, whilst retaining the 2 stipulated sentences used today. It is not clear if any given religious (or non-religious) organisation will always adhere to the unchanging wedding ceremony words that were submitted by their HQ, possibly years ago.
3. Whilst the marriage document / certificate can contain the necessary expression of consent to marry the other named person, it can be too easy to sign what is put in front of you and not read the small print. It is unclear what level of understanding and preparation has been achieved by each person prior to the ceremony.
4. Yes

Consultation Question 43:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Without stipulated sentences being enforced or agreed minima, the legality could be challenged later. I have already commented on the appointment, registration and training of officiants needs to be much more rigorous.

Consultation Question 44:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Agree there should be flexibility about the form of weddings in these 3 traditions but should be expanded to include other Christian denominations. Publicly spoken verbal promises of each persons undertaking and commitment to the marriage is an important part in forming stable relationships; there should be an expectation that these are included since marriage is THE foundational social structure.

Consultation Question 45:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Broadly yes, but there may be issues with, e.g. weddings at a Register Office, where some Local Government officiants may or may not be comfortable with religious language content. Will Local Government officiants now have the time to spend time with couple understanding and agreeing to include any religious language to include in their civil ceremony? More likely to generate tension, when a choice religious ceremonies are offered elsewhere.

Please share your views below:

Many religious people will take their vows as serious life-long intentions of commitment, but would want to acknowledge some for of divine support / assistance in their desire to keep their promises and may select promises that include such desire or invitation. More likely to generate tension, when a choice religious ceremonies are offered elsewhere.

Consultation Question 46:

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 47:

This a further safeguard against secretive, forced or bogus weddings.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Weddings should always be tied to a registered building, with a registered organisation sponsoring the officiant / authorised person. Quality standards for a legal marriage are almost impossible to enforce if anywhere may be selected.

on inland waters such as lakes or rivers,, in the air, and/or, in private homes.

Please share your views below:

Outdoors only if part of a registered building, with a registered organisation sponsoring the officiant / authorised person.

Consultation Question 49:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Whether civil or religious they should both be under the same standards and safeguards.

Weddings should always be tied to a registered building, with a registered organisation sponsoring the officiant / authorised person. Quality standards for a legal marriage are almost impossible to enforce if anywhere may be selected.

Consultation Question 50:

Other

Other

Other

Please expand on your answer:

The key here is the venue. The organisation controlling the venue (i.e. a building) should be able to unilaterally decided what type of ceremony they will permit / what type of ceremony their officiants / authorised person(s) they sponsor can conduct.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I have already expressed my concerns over the idea of autonomous independent officiants who have no sponsoring organisation to ensure they continue to be trained and are fit persons to conduct ceremonies. They would no little or no accountability for their decisions, actions and probably few records of the reasoning behind location choices and the details of the ceremony performed. Continue to use registered buildings.

Consultation Question 52:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Safe and Dignified are too subjective, even with guidelines. Having a registered building removes these risks. The registered building will already be validated as Safe and Dignified and have an approved ceremony to use provided by the religious/non-religious organisation, with the ceremony conducted by a officiant / authorised person for that building, who is also registered to Superintendent Registrar.

No

Please expand on your answer:

Should not be needed. Remain with weddings being conducted in registered buildings.

Consultation Question 53:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Optional? So it then would not matter if the location had not been approved by any Government body before being used? This is a concern, better to have pre-registered buildings and registered officiants / authorised persons who are sponsored by an appropriate organisation to regulate ceremonies in accordance with the organisation's submitted ceremony and the legal clauses.

Please share your views below:

it would have to be the Local Government Registrar's Office that reviews these; if it is only a few venues that regularly host weddings - you could call the registered buildings. If it is only optional then weddings may be held anywhere unless officiants are linked to that venue. If it is deemed essential to approve locations ahead of a wedding, clearly it would be a burden on the Local Authority if many weddings are conducted in random places with an expectation that a member of Local Authority staff has to visit and assess its suitability.

Chapter 8: Registration

Consultation Question 56:

Chapter 10: Validity and offences

Consultation Question 57:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Use of witnesses should be retained and would be important if the legality of the ceremony was ever challenged by either party.
If the legal contract of the marriage is the signing of the marriage document / schedule (beyond any verbal statements during ceremony) the document cannot be left unsigned.
Currently officiants are required to provide quarterly returns for each building, this ensures every marriage is registered.

Consultation Question 58:

Other

By permitting weddings beyond registered buildings under registered organisations, this loses control of the quality controls, public access and legal standards of conduct and accountability.

Consultation Question 70:

Please share your views below:

By permitting weddings beyond registered buildings under registered organisations, this loses control of the quality controls, public access and legal standards of conduct and accountability. Couples can opt for a party on any vessel at any location of their choice at a later (or earlier) date, but the legal wedding ceremony should be constrained and be potentially subjected to being independently audited by UK authorities.

Consultation Question 71:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is opening marriages to being performed in an illegal way. Without the couple registering exactly which organisation is providing the approved ceremony and their sponsored officiant / authorised person at a registered building, the marriage may not be registered afterwards or legal commitments may have been used.

Consultation Question 72:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A land-based Officiant / Authorised Person can be required to submit marriage documents on a timely basis following the wedding, it may well not be possible for ship's crew. There would be no quarterly returns from such ship's company to confirm all conducted weddings had been registered.

No

Please expand on your answer:

I have already raised concerns over the idea of independent autonomous officiants who are not part of any sponsoring organisation, have no accountability for their decisions, operations and training. This will inevitably lead to confusion over whether a wedding did take place, its use of an approved ceremony and legality of any verbal statements at the time.

No

Please expand on your answer:

I have already raised concerns over the idea of "flying officiants" (or sailing officiants?) who are not part of any sponsoring organisation, have no accountability for their decisions, operations and training. This will inevitably lead to confusion over whether a wedding did take place, its use of an approved ceremony and legality of any verbal statements at the time.

Consultation Question 73:

Please share your views below:

There may well be a demand from a survey of couples, but this doesn't justify relaxing safeguards to accommodate this idea.

Consultation Question 74:

No

Please expand on your answer:

How would the Registrar's Office know that a schedule had not been returned as expected? Given that the notice of intent is valid for 12 months. Responsibility should remain with officiant to submit paper evidence or at least a rapid on-line submission, even ahead of the provision of signed documents. This brings legal and financial clarity if the couple lose documents, fail to respond or lose their lives shortly after marrying.

This should not slide into the accreditation of casual personnel who for commercial gain offer their services anytime / anyplace / anywhere, without accountability. Any cost of registering an officiant tied to an organisation should be borne by the organisation.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

1. My experience is that current legal process and costs do not discourage marriages from taking place. Couples may say they can't afford to get married, this isn't ~£100 for legal notifications, it's the £10,000 they think they need to spend on reception venue, meals, drinks, flowers, honeymoon, video / photographer, wedding cars, live band etc.
2. These proposals are seeking to make it more causal to sign-up for to marriage; trying to reduce legal costs is not going to affect a couple's planning and desire for marriage. Marriage must be seen in the light of the proven stability it brings to society, the likelihood of better outcomes for children of married parents. I really doubt if the legal costs charged today cover overall administration effort by all staff. The benefit of current laws constraints and processes must be seen in the context of reducing illegal / forced weddings, promoting legal rights for both parties and any citizenship / residency checks that underpin today's marriage processes.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1. Cost of a simple room hire of £57 is not excessive, the local authority should ensure basic low-cost rooms are available within their buildings.
  2. With many approved buildings, there is a range of quality and costs on a commercial basis (e.g. hotels, as well as religious), with competition amongst providers.
  3. Use of our church building is free for those who are associated with the church; likely to be common to other religious organisations. Noting that if additional services are used (music, flowers there would be additional costs), Similarly for the premises of non-religious organisations, who have a reason to promote marriage, would want to offer a venue at an affordable price to members.
  4. Use of non-authorised locations would increase costs, i.e. initial assessment, any appeals, Registration Officer's hours, time agreeing what is provided by the venue and what is provided as part of the marriage service.
- Stick with Register Office and Authorised Buildings venues, preserve the dignity and significance - and after marrying , couples can have a party anywhere they want

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1. There should be statutory requirement for a Register Office to provide a simple room and ceremony at a similar cost to today's, on a range of dates to facilitate marriage.
2. Savings should not be a reason to drive towards a casual "anywhere is OK" approach as it risks bogus ceremonies, with unregistered business-driven officiants, with associated lack of legal paperwork and timely submission of signed evidence.
3. I do not think that conducting a legal marriage in an authorised building by a registered officiant / Authorised Person should be removed. Many couples want a church religious ceremony, for the sense of tradition, history and longevity it brings - even if not regular religious attendees. If couples have to attend a Register Office for the "legal bit" and make their vows then, when it comes to the main event, with quite possibly religious language, making vows "in the sight of God", it detracts from this main event with witnessed promises, if it has been done before at the Council offices, leaving them unsure exactly when they made their life-long commitment to each other.

Consultation Question 87:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

1. If new venues are often requested, then the couple would need to bear the costs of each assessment visit.
2. Approved premises should be able to sponsor an Approved Person to act as officiant as part of their wedding offerings. If the couple decide to use a Local Authority Registration Officer then it is reasonable for a charge to be made, recognising that not every date proposed could be supported. Consideration should be given to the additional planning effort involved for the Registration Officer to dove-tail the legal part of the ceremony as part of the overall event.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

1. There would be little long-term benefit since a venue would only need to go through an approval once.
2. Use of Registration Officers at civil weddings, rather than an independent business-driven, may give everyone greater confidence that the transaction was completed legally. However, typically couples will seek to tailor the order of service, music, words of promise, symbolism of the ceremony to suit their aspirations; this flexibility may be difficult for a Registration Officer to accommodate, within a fixed-price booking.
3. That would give a benefit to the couple in deciding more about the ceremony, providing all parties can agree. This should not slip into use of independent business-driven officiants, with no accountability for their performance.
4. The business opportunities are there to be realised from increasing the numbers of weddings and the wider benefits of a stable relationships to society.

However, to promote more marriages the Government needs to consistently promote marriage as the bond that has served us well for millennia, stating its value and promoting marriage preparation , rather than trying to make it cheaper and easier.

Consultation Question 89:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1. Agreed in principle. It is not clear from the question under which jurisdiction they would be legally married, but if they are married under another jurisdiction, there must be specific advice to the couple to ensure the marriage process chosen is fully recognised in UK.
2. Similar to 1., there must be specific advice to the couple to ensure the marriage process chosen is fully recognised in another jurisdiction (e.g. a same-sex couple might marry here, but the marriage may not be valid in their own country.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1. It may benefit the couple to have greater choice but I suggest little benefit to the jurisdictions of the various counties.

I have already expressed my concerns over insufficient oversight / quality standards of marriages undertaken whilst at sea. I reiterate concern over the formal recording of such events, together with concerns over the form of ceremony selected and the use of prescribed sentences to validate the undertakings.

I, as an Authorised Person for a building, am able to provide multiple copies of their validated marriage certificate for their immediate use in dealing with Government, financial institutions, use in processing changes that typically follow a marriage: change of name, updates to passports, benefit claim impacts, employment etc.

It may be a benefit to a maritime business to be able to host weddings, with all the associated paying guests. For the legal Governance of marriages in raises too many concerns.

Consultation Question 91:

Please share your views below:

1. Government and local authorities may save a small amount of money if more of these free-and-easy changes are made, but if record keeping deteriorates and/or is error prone, it will cost the Government and local authorities much more to rectify.
2. Venus should benefit from being able to sell a complete package of wedding services, legal ceremony, registered officiant and hosted reception, but MUST accept they must only provide registered officiant under their authority.
3. Religious (and non-religious belief) organisations will want to continue to provide a one-stop legal marriage ceremony, in a registered building, upholding the standards of marriage. Their belief in marriage, motivates them to offer to conduct marriages.
4. Independent autonomous officiants may see this is as an opportunity to start a business. We read of court cases where the status of a couple is challenged by the parties as to whether they are assumed to be married because of co-habiting , shared assets and financial linkage - seeking a fair apportionment.
5. Couples may like to have greater flexibility over location, however they will be conscious that their wedding must be legal and formally documented as such.

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is based on promises made by each party and so words must be used in order to create a legally binding agreement. The set phrases mean that there is solemnity and that the vows are taken seriously, rather than a silly set of meaningless sentences or no words at all.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Do you propose that people may say whatever they want in the marriage ceremony?

If so, I disagree. Because that takes the word 'marriage' into Alice in Wonderland territory.

You must first define marriage; then the elements in that definition should be explicitly stated and agreed to in the ceremony.

So, if marriage is defined as an exclusive union between a man and a woman, freely undertaken, for life, and open to children, then those elements must be expressly included in the ceremony.

What's your definition of marriage?

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

One of the Law Commission's goals is that "the ceremony that is meaningful to the couple should be recognised by law". This can happen at the moment in churches that do not have an authorised person, by having a civil registrar to register the marriage. If this is not possible, many couples who attend such churches are likely to require a civil ceremony separate to their church wedding.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

“contrary to public policy or morality” is too subjective an assessment. It would risk those with unpopular but entirely legal views being excluded from nominating officiants. The test should focus on objective criteria. These could include promoting purposes that are illegal or support illegal activity (such as terrorism), that advocate the violent overthrow of democracy, or that undermine the rule of law.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

Provided the training and preparation for the office includes marriage

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Currently, wedding officiants are either highly trained registrars or religious representatives who are likely to have strongly-held beliefs on marriage. Allowing independent officiants would open the door to those who may not place such a high value on marriage.

Independent officiants can currently conduct weddings that are not legally binding. These have included ceremonies underwater, in a sadomasochism dungeon, at a comic book convention with a couple dressed as fictional characters, and at a ruined leper hospital on Halloween. Another involved a couple dressed as hedgehogs. Such ceremonies could be legally binding if independent officiants were allowed, undermining the dignity of marriage.

One reason couples might choose independent officiants is because they have been refused the religious ceremony of their choice. This might happen where a couple's beliefs or behaviour are not consistent with the religion they choose for the wedding. Having an independent officiant conduct a pseudo-religious ceremony could misrepresent the religious group's position on, for example, same-sex marriage. Or there might be beliefs from more than one religion brought into a single ceremony, giving a distorted picture of all the faiths involved.

Currently there is no financial incentive to officiate a wedding. Opening up a market for independent officiants makes wedding vows a commercial concern. Those more willing to be flexible with the ceremony would be likely to profit the most, encouraging people to push the boundaries. This also risks defeating the goal of reducing costs of wedding venues, which was one of the stated aims the Government gave the Law Commission in 2018

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

The prescribed words form a foundation for the declarations that are required for a marriage.

Without them the wedding ceremony can be as meaningless as a couple or officiant chooses, and legal marriage can become nothing more than a certificate from the Government.

Marriage is founded on solemn promises made between two parties. Under these proposals it would be possible to have a legally recognised wedding in which no words were said between the couple, let alone promises of any kind.

The commitment made in marriage must be taken very seriously, and without the prescribed words it is much easier to treat the ceremony casually.

The prescribed words are only a small part of the entire wedding ceremony. The rules are already extremely flexible about what happens in the rest of the ceremony. It is hard to imagine a genuine wedding in which the prescribed words could not be included at some stage.

Allowing wholly personalised wedding ceremonies without any legally-required words would send the message that marriage is an entirely private matter.

Consultation Question 43:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

It is far more important that a legal wedding ceremony reflects the seriousness of the commitment the parties are making than that it is personalised to the couple.

Non-legally binding ceremonies can already be as personalised as people want. These have included ceremonies underwater, in a sadomasochism dungeon, at a comic book convention with a couple dressed as fictional characters, and at a ruined leper hospital on Hallowe'en. Another involved a couple dressed as hedgehogs. Personalisation will damage the dignity of the wedding ceremony.

A requirement for officiants to ensure that the ceremony does not undermine the dignity and solemnity of marriage is too subjective. It will not prevent couples finding an officiant to agree to even the most outlandish wishes.

The possibility of fully-tailored wedding ceremonies will encourage commercialisation. Those more willing to be flexible with the ceremony would be likely to profit the most, encouraging people to push the boundaries.

If people can entirely customise their own weddings, they might blend together different elements from faith ceremonies inappropriately, effectively making a parody of those ceremonies. This could be highly offensive to people of those faiths.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The 'open doors' requirement is a valuable part of wedding day celebrations, making it clear that marriage is not a private affair, but rather is important to society as a whole.

The opposite is also important; weddings which are not publicly accessible make a statement that the marriage is private and of interest only to the couple. This couldn't be further from the truth.

Ensuring that weddings are open to any member of the public, rather than just those invited, is a way of protecting against forced marriage and bigamy, for example.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I have a serious concern that it is unclear what safeguards will prevent unsuitable venues being used. How will the dignity of such ceremonies be guaranteed?

The consultation states that venues would need to be 'dignified' and 'safe', but lacks precision on what this means or how it will be tested. Venues must not detract from the solemn occasion of the wedding.

The Law Commission has made it clear it sees no objection to weddings "in the air", suggesting that the terms 'dignified' and 'safe' could be interpreted very broadly.

Unofficial weddings have been conducted in setting that clearly trivialise marriage.

The law must not allow such venues to host legally binding ceremonies.

Chapter 1: Introduction

Consultation Question 1:

No

Please expand on your answer:

We wanted to have a humanist led wedding ceremony, with a script personal to us, in a location personal to us and our families and led by someone who shares our beliefs.

As this type of marriage is not recognised by law we were unable to and had to get legally married in a registry office - very impersonal and not really relevant to what we believe and feel.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We looked into humanist ceremonies but realised they were not recognised by law, which we found very unfair and disappointing.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

We did have a legally binding ceremony (the most basic register office one) which was just to get a piece of paper - it meant nothing more than that. We only had 2 witnesses in attendance. We will be having a humanist ceremony in 2021 which we will class as our actual wedding and are very much excited about and looking forward to. It doesn't seem to make sense that this cannot be the legally binding one.

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 2:

Please share your views below:

Many barriers meant our legal ceremony was not meaning or personal. Restrictions from the registry office on what you can do/say. Limited choices and no opportunity to personalise. This was made even worse by covid restrictions (not their fault) but it really made the ceremony feel meaningless, short and impersonal - more so than it already would have.

Legal barriers are that a humanist celebrant cannot legally marry us.

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The standard required format of weddings has stood the test of time and is widely respected. It helps to preserve the solemnity and dignity of marriage and should be retained. There is sufficient flexibility for the format of weddings to vary around this core requirement.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

As in response to Q42, there is already sufficient scope for wedding ceremonies and the wedding day as a whole to accommodate the preferences of those getting married and their guests. #### Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The consultation paper notes that as many as half of all places of worship do not have a registered person (5.59). We would draw attention to the fact that this will include a significant number of churches that use registration officers for weddings. We know that this is the case at some of the churches our supporters attend.

Churches that use civil registrars choose to pay for this service even though there is no equivalent recurring cost to have a church member fulfil the role. There are a variety of reasons for this. Many small congregations rarely hold weddings or have regularly changing leadership. It is impractical or unduly burdensome for them to keep track of the training, legal requirements and related administration that registering weddings would require. These congregations depend on being able to use civil registrars. They are rightly taking seriously their responsibility to ensure their wedding ceremonies comply with the legal requirements.

As a consequence of this change, some Christian couples who wish to have legally binding religious ceremonies in their own churches – and could currently do so – will instead be denied them. This reduction in access to meaningful marriage ceremonies contradicts the stated intentions of the proposals.<sup>[1]</sup> These couples will have to hold a civil ceremony separate to a more meaningful religious service that holds no legal status.

We struggle to see the justification for this move. The consultation paper comments that the presence of a civil registration officer at a religious wedding may lead to confusion about whether this is a separate civil wedding (5.57). This confusion is unlikely regarding church weddings. The inevitable conclusion is that churches are being penalised as a consequence of venue options being expanded. It also seems contradictory that the Law Commission asks about including religious elements in civil ceremonies, which is potentially far more confusing (6.73-6.110).

If the proposal to expand the possible venues for weddings goes ahead, guidance from the General Register Office could define the role of civil registration officers at religious weddings. This could explain that they are responsible for the legal administration but are not participating in any religious aspects of the service. If needed, further clarification could be provided to the couple and witnesses by attending officers on the day of the ceremony itself.

The Law Commission believes the proposed change will improve access to civil weddings (5.58). As this requires a corresponding reduction in religious weddings, it risks discriminating against those choosing religious ceremonies.

It is not clear how well this definition of non-religious belief organisations would work in practice. While definitions of 'religious' groups have long been disputed, there is extensive precedent and broad agreement over the approach taken in law. The proposed definition has apparently been tested against Humanist beliefs, but it is unclear which other groups might potentially fall within the category or be excluded. The consultation acknowledges this in asking about groups which might be specifically excluded (5.147).

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Evaluating organisations' purposes against 'public policy or morality' is much too subjective. In a democratic country, people are free to disagree and dispute one another's political or moral stances. This is especially the case within the plurality of religious beliefs in England and Wales. There cannot be any single 'public morality' to which every group could be compared, other than mere prevailing opinion. This is likely to disadvantage views that were once mainstream – and remain perfectly lawful – but have fallen out of favour.

In our work we have given support to many individuals who have been wrongly discriminated against for lawful but unpopular beliefs. We are concerned that any law seeking to exclude religious organisations from marrying couples based on a 'public policy or morality' test could discriminate against those holding traditional Christian views.

The assessment should be based on more objective and clearly defined benchmarks: organisations promoting purposes that are illegal, promote illegal activity or undermine the rule of law, for example.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The Consultation Terms of Reference state that it is not the responsibility of the Law Commission to "make recommendations as to whether the groups who can solemnize marriage can be expanded".[1] At the same time the consultation paper states the aim to create a system that "treats groups the same", applying the same rules to each (5.143). Yet this cannot be the case, nor should it be. Each 'group' has its own values and objectives, as well as corresponding risks.

This is most obviously the case for 'independent officiants'. While religious groups and the civil registration system have clearly defined reasons for carrying out marriages, independent celebrants are typically used by couples who wish to hold ceremonies that fall outside what the law permits. While this may be for relatively uncontroversial reasons – to hold a wedding outdoors, for example – there are many cases of ceremonies taking place which are highly undignified. Little academic research has been done in this area, but we note the article 'The day of their dreams' in Child and Family Law Quarterly.[2] A large number of examples are given: a ceremony held in the "sale ring of a local cattle market" where the celebrant acted as auctioneer; a ceremony held in a "theatre made to look like a woodland burrow"; ceremonies focused on the consumption of alcohol; a ceremony "on Hallowe'en in 'the ruin of a leper hospital'"; one couple who dressed as hedgehogs; and "two ceremonies in an 'S&M dungeon'". It is obvious that these ceremonies would (rightly) not fall within the current requirements for a legal ceremony. Yet under the proposals these may be possible at the officiant's discretion. Celebrants who take part in these ceremonies produce a significant risk to the dignity and solemnity of marriage, and this is not properly considered by the proposals.

Independent celebrants also have an extraordinarily low threshold of the acceptability of content in ceremonies they conduct.[3] Of the same study's 287 respondents, 22 said they would impose no boundaries at all on the content couples wish to include. A further 34 would only require that the content be "non-criminal" and "posed no health or safety risk". The study suggests that almost a quarter of all independent celebrants were willing to conduct weddings that contained obscene, violent or offensive content. It is unthinkable that the threshold for what is acceptable within a marriage ceremony could be set so low.

Another danger relates to the inclusion of religious content within independent celebrants' ceremonies. One of the main reasons couples choose independent celebrants is to access religious ceremonies where religious officiants have refused to carry it out. Most often this will happen when a couple's beliefs or lifestyle are inconsistent with that required for the chosen ceremony. It is deeply hurtful when religious beliefs are parodied by pseudo-religious ceremonies, carried out by those with no belief in what they say or do. Falsified versions of religious rites must not be allowed in legally binding wedding ceremonies.

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The responsibility for nomination of officiants should lie with the relevant organisation. However, some safeguards are advisable. An age restriction and requirement that the legal responsibilities are understood (as proposed for independent officiants) should be declared by the nominating organisation. It may be reasonable to ask nominating organisations to provide basic details of suitable training undertaken.

While it is inappropriate for the law to prescribe who can represent a religious group or what training they should have taken, there is a great deal of variety among groups. It is right that the law should maintain the seriousness and dignity of marriage by taking steps to ensure those who administer it are 'fit and proper'.

Consultation Question 31:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

See our answer to question 29: we believe that the inclusion of independent officiants within any scheme jeopardises the dignity and solemnity of marriage. The current law recognises the seriousness of marriage, but there are many examples of independent celebrants providing unofficial services that could never be considered appropriate.

With such a significant risk involved, there must be robust safeguards put in place if independent officiants were introduced. A 'fit and proper' test would require much more than a minimum age and training set out by the Registrar General.

Consultation Question 32:

Churches provide a valuable service to their community by holding weddings, not for any profit of their own. Although some Humanist weddings occur because they are representative of the beliefs of those being married, studies have found that in Scotland the majority who choose such ceremonies do so for the personalisation available.[1] It would be of great concern if 'non-religious beliefs' became a legal loophole for the commercialisation of wedding ceremonies. Such officiants should be prohibited from making a business from officiating at weddings. There should be no profit-making incentive. Any fees chargeable for legal weddings should be in line with Civil Register Officers on a cost recovery basis.

Consultation Question 33:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Legally recognised wedding ceremonies must not be commercialised. Any fees chargeable for legal weddings should be in line with Civil Register Officers on a cost-recovery basis.

Independent celebrants say they want to offer couples the chance to personalise their ceremony or hold them at venues not currently allowed.[1] While this may be true, it is unlikely they would be motivated to continue offering such services without also making a profit from it. The cost to have a registrar attend a wedding at a registry office is £46, yet independent celebrants self-report charging up to £3,000 even though they cannot legally marry a couple.[2]

These extremely high prices that can already be paid for independent celebrants suggest that opening up a marketplace for highly individualised legal ceremonies would vastly increase the fee couples will be expected to pay for ever-more outlandish weddings. There will be a financial incentive for officiants to push the boundaries of taste. This has extremely concerning implications for the dignity and solemnity of weddings and would also conflict with the Law Commission's clear aim of reducing weddings costs (Terms of Reference, 1.32, page 17 and 2.1, page 27). See also our answers to question 29 and 31.

This sector is currently small. A large proportion of independent celebrants only started to practise in the last few years.[3] It is likely that (if they are enabled by Government to officiate at legal weddings) the sector will grow even more rapidly, with many seeking to make a profit from the opportunity. The system must protect wedding ceremonies from profiteering.

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a profoundly serious commitment, and it is right to uphold the dignity and solemnity of the wedding ceremony in law. We are, however, concerned that the proposal does not go far enough, relating only to the "conduct of the officiant rather than the content of the ceremony" (5.194). While we accept that the officiant cannot be held responsible for undignified actions of attendees on the day itself, responsibility for the content and tone of the ceremony should nonetheless remain with the officiant.

'Dignity' and 'solemnity' lack clear definition. The threshold appears to be remarkably low, with weddings "in the air" expected to fall within the scheme. Given the seriousness with which marriage commitments must be made and the risks involved in the proposed widening of options for wedding ceremonies, these highly subjective terms should be fully explained, and the responsibilities set in law.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Guidance should emphasise the seriousness of the marriage commitments and that dignity and solemnity of marriage must be upheld in the conduct, content and tone of the ceremony. It should be clear that this consideration hugely outweighs the wishes of the parties.

Guidance alone is not enough to allay concerns about the implications of the proposals for the wedding ceremony. Stronger safeguards need to be created. Complying with the guidance would have to be binding upon officiants. Those found to have breached it should be deemed to be failing to comply with their responsibilities and duties, with potential sanctions including de-authorisation.

Consultation Question 38:

While we agree, we refer to our response to question 26. It is not possible to measure officiants against 'public policy or morality' as this is far too subjective and likely to penalise legally held but unpopular views. 'Failure to comply' must be limited to their clearly defined legal responsibilities, which should include abiding by guidance upholding the dignity of marriage. Particular care and sensitivity would be required if the General Register Office took action against an officiant nominated by a religious organisation.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The proposed removal of the 'prescribed words' is a serious concern. The current requirements in law are minimal, with the Marriage Act 1949 containing only two short declarations which must be made in a marriage ceremony. However, despite their brevity, they set out a framework of what is anticipated in a legal marriage ceremony. Any impediment to marry should have been found in the preliminaries, but the assertion within the ceremony makes a verbal statement to those witnessing that this is the case at the point of marriage, adding certainty. A couple will have twelve months from completing the preliminaries in which to get married. Significant things could change in this time, including one of the parties marrying someone else abroad. The prescribed words mean that there is a public declaration, on the wedding day, that the parties are both free and willing to marry.

The second phrase – "I [name] take you [or thee] [name] to be my wedded wife [or husband]" – is reduced in the proposals to an 'expression of consent'.<sup>[1]</sup> But this ignores the strong implication of 'intent' that it also contains. It makes clear that intent is a key element to legal marriage for both parties: marriage cannot be entered into passively. The current proposals could negatively impact the public understanding of what marriage means, the lifelong commitment it represents, and the positive effort required by both parties to make marriage work. Marriage is not something that is 'done' to a consenting individual – merely a change in legal status – but a lifelong choice which requires active participation.

The current verbal commitment is the most suitable way to ensure that the law's expectation and requirements are equally met at every marriage ceremony. The form of words used within Anglican ceremonies is similar to the requirements for civil weddings and 'other religious' weddings.<sup>[2]</sup> A majority of respondents to the pre-consultation stated that their ceremonies would be able to include the prescribed words. Given how minimal the requirements are, it is difficult to conceive of a genuine wedding which could not manage to include verbal declarations at some point – even if this was a discrete part of the ceremony.

Prescribed words are a minimal requirement that helps set out the legal expectation and meaning of marriage. They do not prevent wedding ceremonies being adapted or the personality and beliefs of the couple being displayed on the wedding day. As the consultation paper notes "the law has allowed considerable freedom as to the religious rites that can accompany [religious] weddings" (10.102) and we see no reason to suggest that prescribed words impede that freedom.

Elevating couples' preferences to the extent of saying that it must be possible to completely personalise a ceremony suggests a gross misunderstanding of marriage. In getting married, a couple is entering an institution that is understood by society and has a legal definition. The public declaration is something that society and the law have an interest in. Wholly personalised wedding ceremonies send the message that the marriage is only about the couple, an entirely private matter that is decoupled from the law and wider society. This is a damaging misconception.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This proposal is not clear. To the extent that the Law Commission supports the removal of current requirement for specific 'usages' for certain groups, we defer to the relevant groups. However, where the proposal seeks to reaffirm 'individualisation' and 'customisability' of marriage ceremonies, this has entirely the wrong emphasis. (See our answer to question 42.)

The seriousness of the commitments made in marriage is foremost; the dignity and solemnity of marriage must be maintained within the ceremony. Again, the article 'The day of their dreams' has many examples of inappropriate forms of ceremonies already taking place: underwater, in a sadomasochism dungeon, at a comic book convention with a couple dressed as fictional characters, and at a ruined leper hospital on Halloween to select just a few.<sup>[1]</sup> If this proposal is enacted, it opens the door to these forms of ceremonies being recognised in law. Even where an officiant does not agree with such a ceremony, the couple can simply find another officiant who is willing. Again, this inevitably commercialises wedding ceremonies, offering a financial incentive to officiants most willing to be 'flexible'.

There is also the issue of religious elements being included within civil ceremonies, as mentioned in our response to question 29 and again below. Parties cannot simply pick-and-mix religious elements without reducing the marriage ceremony to parody or fantasy, causing offence and damaging the dignity and seriousness of the occasion.

Consultation Question 45:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

There is the obvious possibility that this proposal might blur the lines between civil and religious services, which must be considered. In other contexts, like barring civil registrars from officiating at religious weddings, the consultation paper also recognises this concern. A wedding ceremony needs to provide certainty that it has been properly conducted, and there is a danger that the inclusion of some religious elements could cast doubt on this. For example, the use of some religious rites might give rise to the concern that, as they were not administered by a religious authority, they are meaningless and void. However, this would arguably breach the requirement that the ceremony remains identifiable as a civil rather than religious ceremony.

As previously mentioned, some religious practices being performed outside their proper setting might parody genuine religious beliefs and ceremonies, causing deep offence to those of religious faith.

Readings from the Bible are unlikely to parody or cause offence and could be of great benefit to the couple and attendees.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The 'open doors' requirement of wedding ceremonies is not only a much-loved tradition, but also an asset to a couple's day. Marriage is vital to our society, laying the foundations for healthy family life and healthy communities. Marriage is not a private affair: it creates permanent bonds between families, establishes new economic units and brings other benefits beyond the individuals involved.<sup>[1]</sup> When couples divorce it has a huge impact on society, from additional support required for children, the need for more housing, the greatly increased potential of financial hardship, and the damage done to social cohesion when couples fall out and tear apart groups of friends and family. Marriage is personal, but not 'private'.

The requirement that wedding ceremonies take place with 'open doors' makes a clear statement about the societal role that marriage plays. Removing it would suggest the opposite.

Historically, a significant reason for having open doors at weddings was as a safeguard against abuses such as forced or bigamous marriages, as acknowledged by the consultation paper (6.122, page 201). These concerns still exist in our society. While abuses should be discovered through the preliminaries, this is not always the case. Moreover, that fact that a couple will have twelve months to get married after completing the preliminaries creates a substantial window in which circumstances could change dramatically. Someone could marry in another jurisdiction, for example, or one party could decide against marrying but be forced to continue with it. It seems reckless to dispense with the important safeguard of open doors, which allows concerns to be raised on the day. The existence of the open doors policy has a deterrent effect that is valuable, regardless of whether examples of its use can be found.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Please expand on your answer:

Most churches that do not currently own their buildings but meet in schools or community centres, for example, cannot hold weddings. The proposal could enable many of them to have legal wedding ceremonies in their own places of worship. This would be a clear benefit of the proposal, but there are also major dangers that would outweigh the positives unless proper precautions are built in.

We are deeply concerned by how permissive the system outlined in the consultation paper would be. While it states that the officiant will have to ensure the venue is “safe and dignified” (7.5), it mentions weddings taking place “in the air” (7.137) and notes that no evidence has been found of couples in England insisting on ceremonies in undignified locations (7.139). It is very surprising and disappointing that weddings “in the air” seem to be considered dignified (in particular, examples of ‘parachuting’ ceremonies).[1] There are accounts of ceremonies taking place in locations as varied as a supermarket aisle,[2] an ‘S&M dungeon’, ‘the ruin of a leper hospital’ and a cattle-market.[3] The law must not recognise or enable these venues to be considered suitable for a wedding.

Strong safeguards would be required to prevent marriage being trivialised. One option might be to require the General Register Office's approval for any venues that have not previously been used for weddings, to help guarantee their suitability. Marriage is an extremely serious commitment, which must take place in a dignified and solemn setting. The law has a duty to uphold this.

Please expand on your answer:

Blurring the lines between religious and civil wedding ceremonies in a significant way would be a mistake. Clarity and certainty are important concepts for wedding law. However, the key point is for the ceremonies to be distinct. It should be clear from the ceremony whether it is a religious or civil wedding, irrespective of the venue. This does not negate the importance of the venue being an appropriately dignified one, as stressed elsewhere in this response.

Certainly, there must be no way to compel religious venues to host a wedding ceremony against the religious organisation's will. As the consultation paper notes, property rights rightly allow the owners of religious buildings to prohibit their use for non-religious purposes (7.155). This must not be changed.

Consultation Question 51:

We have reservations about a lack of safeguards for the dignity of the venue if the responsibility is placed solely on officiants. Please see our answers to questions 48 and 52.

Consultation Question 52:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

Responsibility for safety and dignity should be part of the duty of officiants, and they should be held to account. However, there are concerns if officiants would be able to unilaterally ‘approve’ venues.

Previous answers note the many undignified locations that have previously been accepted by individual celebrants, including ‘S&M dungeons’ and ‘the ruins of a leper hospital’. These are clearly unacceptable, so strong safeguards should be put in place. Approval by the General Register Office required would be one option. Nonetheless, approval of a venue might not guarantee its suitability on a given wedding day. For example, if a theatre were approved, it could hold an appropriate ceremony on one day but be dressed in an undignified way the next. The responsibility of the officiant to ensure dignity would then be relied upon.

The process of approving many buildings should initially be straightforward as it should be possible to transfer currently approved venues into any new scheme. It should also be possible to pre-approve religious venues that are the regular place of worship of approved officiants, for example.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

There must be strong and binding guidance from the GRO on suitable venues, but the relevant definitions need to be clarified: it is unclear how the consultation paper defines 'safe and dignified'. These are highly subjective terms, yet the dignity of ceremony venues is critical to the proper understanding of the significance of the marriage.

We agree with the principle that the Registrar General should be able to prescribe a fee for applications. It would be very disappointing to see churches having to pay any more than they currently do for registering a building for solemnisation of marriage.

Should commercial officiants be allowed (which we disagree with) then a different fee scale might be appropriate, to support what we believe should be additional oversight of such officiants by the GRO.

Definitely not. "Contrary to public policy or morality" is too subjective. It would risk those with unpopular but entirely legal views being excluded from nominating officiants. The test should instead focus on objective criteria - such as promoting purposes that are illegal or support illegal activity (such as terrorism), that advocate the violent overthrow of democracy, or that undermine the rule of law.

Currently, wedding officiants are either highly trained registrars or religious representatives who are likely to have strongly-held beliefs on marriage. Allowing independent officiants would open the door to those who may not place such a high value on marriage. Independent officiants have conducted not-legally-binding weddings including ceremonies underwater, in a sadomasochism dungeon, at a comic book convention with a couple dressed as fictional characters, and at a ruined leper hospital on Halloween. If such ceremonies were made legally binding it would undermine the dignity of marriage.

Additionally, an independent officiant could conduct a pseudo-religious ceremony which could misrepresent the religious group's position on, for example, same-sex marriage. Or there might be beliefs from more than one religion brought into a single ceremony, giving a distorted picture of all the faiths involved.

(1) The prescribed words form a foundation for the declarations that are required for a marriage. Without them the wedding ceremony can be as meaningless as a couple or officiant chooses, and legal marriage can become nothing more than a certificate from the Government. (2) Marriage is founded on solemn promises made between two parties. Under these proposals it would be possible to have a legally recognised wedding in which no words were said between the couple, let alone promises of any kind. (3) The commitment made in marriage must be taken very seriously, and without the prescribed words it is much easier to treat the ceremony casually. (4) Allowing wholly personalised wedding ceremonies without any legally-required words would send the message that marriage is an entirely private matter.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

(1) It is far more important that a legal wedding ceremony reflects the seriousness of the commitment the parties are making than that it is personalised to the couple.
(2) Non-legally binding ceremonies can already be as personalised as people want. These have included ceremonies underwater, in a sadomasochism dungeon, etc. Personalisation will damage the dignity of the wedding ceremony.
(3) A requirement for officiants to ensure that the ceremony does not undermine the dignity and solemnity of marriage is too subjective.
(4) If people can entirely customise their own weddings, they might blend together different elements from faith ceremonies inappropriately, effectively making a parody of those ceremonies. This could be highly offensive to people of those faiths.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The 'open doors' requirement is a valuable part of wedding day celebrations, making it clear that marriage is not a private affair, but rather is important to society as a whole.
Ensuring that weddings are open to any member of the public, rather than just those invited, is a way of protecting against forced marriage and bigamy, for example.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is unclear what safeguards will prevent unsuitable venues being used. How will the dignity of such ceremonies be guaranteed? Unofficial weddings have been conducted underwater, in a sadomasochism dungeon, at a comic book convention with a couple dressed as fictional characters, and at a ruined leper hospital on Halloween. Such settings clearly trivialise marriage. The law must not allow such venues to host legally binding ceremonies.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

1. For the majority it is the idea of selfless commitment that many are 'discouraged' by, but this is absolutely essential to what marriage is and cannot be removed.
2. It may lead to an increase but in general this would not be a good thing, as it will likely be an increase in marriages taken less seriously and so will they be far less likely to last. Rather have people face the present-day solemn commitment that marriage is, than have more subscribe to a cheapened version. This answer is particularly pertaining to the proposed laws about individualisation and privatisation of wedding ceremonies.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

How do we determine what is contrary to public policy or morality? My morality could be different to yours, and what if my moral opinion is based on views that are not popular, which prevails?

This point should be more objective and deal with facts - so any wedding seen to be promoting an illegal activity could be banned for example.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

Yes if these are recognised offices

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

all other "businesses" are regulated, why shouldnt this one be to avoid illegal activities and fraud on the part of the officiant

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It seems we could be at risk of undermining marriage if anyone can simply choose to officiate at a wedding, thereby making it a somewhat lucrative employment choice, pushing up prices. I thought this was against the aims of the Law Commission given in 2018?

The question of where would this end comes to mind: marriage should be taken seriously and if those conducting the service do not hold marriage in high esteem, or they are not trained and understand the law, this makes a mockery of the institution of marriage. Currently, "celebrants" do this and in most cases it is because the couple want something "different" and thus are not taking their marriage vows seriously.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The couple should be made to say vows to each other as that is the basis for the marriage contract, it is a promise, a vow to each other. Also, they might not say anything at all - what is this because they don't actually understand the words being said? This is dangerous.

What is the point of the marriage ceremony if the couple or the officiant can change the words or get rid of them completely? You might as well just get a civil partnership and a certificate from a registrar. it could be reduced to popping out for a quick drink and not taken seriously as it should be.

Marriage is a public declaration, not only of your love for one another, but your commitment to each other and is legally binding.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

see comments on q.42 above.

How do we ensure the seriousness of the commitment and dignity of the ceremony itself? Couples could get married anywhere, which could be highly inappropriate - who determines what is dignified and safe? It should be defined.

I understand that currently you can get "married" anywhere although this is just a sham and the marriage has to be registered afterwards. If we make this kind of "joke" wedding legal, why even have marriage laws in the beginning, it makes a joke out of the vows you are taking.

Consultation Question 46:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I think you have to choose between civil or religious ceremony, even if that civil marriage is then "blessed" by the church in a non-binding ceremony afterwards

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It has long been held that a marriage is a "community" pledge, the couple is part of society and marriage benefits society as a whole (the facts support this), it is not a private deal, done behind closed doors but should be open for public (although not the refreshments afterwards!)
What if a marriage were a sham, how could someone alert the officiant to this if they are not allowed to enter or know when and where the wedding is?

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

In principle I would say that I agree.

HOWEVER, as expressed above there must be a safeguards put in place to restrict weddings taking place in a wholly unsuitable venue where the seriousness of the ceremony is mocked.

Please share your views below:

Having weddings in the air takes away the seriousness and undermines the wedding vows - see my comments on vows above.

So long as on solid ground (even if that is on a large boat or a pontoon) the wedding couple and the guests can clearly see and hear what is going on and there are no "distractions" from that.

private homes - this is contentious - if it is a large stately home, set out for this purpose that is fine but in someone's normal residence is too familiar and does not allow the wedding to be public.

Consultation Question 50:

Yes

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The whole reason people get married in church is because they hold a religious conviction, this cannot be mocked. However, I do believe that religious weddings could take place in non-religious venues due to the nature of the words that are said and who is saying them.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

An increase in those being married is always a good thing but not if that ceremony is not taken seriously, the current laws enable everyone to get married that wants to.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

The costs are not that great, it is the rest of it that people spend money on - they have no trouble getting into debt for a honeymoon but moan about the cost of a ceremony! Many churches do not charge at all (or it is a nominal fee based on the ability of the couple to pay).

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

marriage should not be reduced down to cost

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

I have attended a zoom "celebration" of a wedding event which could not be officially registered at that moment in time, due to C19 restrictions in place. It went through the vows and celebrations as would have happened in church but lacked legal basis until a subsequent event could take place. This was disappointing but on the other hand enabled people from all over the country, and the US, Jamaica and South Africa to 'attend' on the front row!

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It should be longer than a midweek break! Marriage is a solemn business and should be treated as more permanent than a half term treat. The residential qualification at least points to some aim of permanence on the arrangement.

Consultation Question 5:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Notice should be given AFTER an in-person interview, not before. Otherwise what is the point of the interview, when publicising is assumed.

People who want to get married as a public oath of commitment are not put off by any of the supposed barriers that many of these changes are attempting to overcome.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

Cost should not be a barrier to marriage; however many couples seem to want to spend money on 'the event' rather than 'the life'. Better for govt to be investing in wedding preparation training for couples than lesser physical barriers to the wedding event.

many churches rely on civil registrars to register weddings, as they do not have their own authorised person.

This idea poses a danger of some churches falling foul of weddings law, as they are required to take responsibility for unfamiliar legalities in order to hold a religious ceremony

Currently, wedding officiants are either highly trained registrars or religious representatives who are likely to have strongly-held beliefs on marriage. Allowing independent officiants would open the door to those who may not place such a high value on marriage.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The commitment made in marriage must be taken very seriously, and without the prescribed words it is much easier to treat the ceremony casually.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is far more important that a legal wedding ceremony reflects the seriousness of the commitment the parties are making than that it is personalised to the couple.

The possibility of fully-tailored wedding ceremonies will encourage commercialisation. Those more willing to be flexible with the ceremony would be likely to profit the most, encouraging people to push the boundaries.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

the 'open doors' requirement is a valuable part of wedding day celebrations, making it clear that marriage is not a private affair, but rather is important to society as a whole.

Ensuring that weddings are open to any member of the public, rather than just those invited, is a way of protecting against forced marriage and bigamy, for example.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The consultation states that venues would need to be 'dignified' and 'safe', but lacks precision on what this means or how it will be tested. Venues must not detract from the solemn occasion of the wedding.

The Law Commission has made it clear it sees no objection to weddings "in the air", suggesting that the terms 'dignified' and 'safe' could be interpreted very broadly.

Consultation Question 2:

Please share your views below:

I felt very strongly about having a non - religious wedding, this was important to me on many levels.

Obviously wanting a legally binding humanist marriage, I found was not possible in England and Wales.

This made a huge difference to our wedding plans as we both felt so strongly about having a legally binding humanist wedding and ensuring no religious content

We had to make some hard decisions and had to shrink our guest list and go to Scotland to be legally married and have our humanist ceremony.

Also we wanted a celebrant who understood what we wanted and we could develop a good relationship with and create a script that reflected us as a couple. This was so good that my celebrant and I still keep in touch.

One thing I noticed when arranging my wedding was the fact that prices for things increased with the word "wedding" in the sentence

Cakes

Venues

Stationary

Entertainment

Photography

I got more value for money with my humanist than I saw with my friends registry wedding that it for sure! Same costing.

Consultation Question 91:

Please share your views below:

I think if you focus on religious and non religious then this reform would be simple, take out the independent officiants as they are not required in this. This is what is making this complicated.
The main focus is the couples themselves, I feel very strongly that I could not have the legally binding wedding I wanted with all my family and friends in England.
The thought of a registry office weddings was awful and to be pushed into picking a.b.c ceremony... no thanks.
Thankfully Scotland allowed legal recognition to humanist marriages - otherwise we would not be married today!

I think it is important that information about any proposal of marriage between 2 parties is clearly available to the public and that unless there is evidence of residence in England or Wales weddings could be arranged for people to arrive immediately prior to the wedding and then depart and there would be no public knowledge of the marriage, thus facilitating sham marriages and forced marriages.

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

Yes. It is important that the officiant at any wedding has previously met and is able to recognise each of the parties to be married to ensure there is no substitution of one or other of the parties.

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

Yes. Without both parties making the declarations the system would be open to misrepresentation.

Consultation Question 18:

Anglican preliminaries should continue to be recognised as legal preliminaries to weddings officiated by the Church of England and the Church in Wales;
or

Please expand on your answer:

A Church of England or Church in Wales ceremony should not need a previous civil ceremony if the officiant at the church wedding is fully recognised as capable and officially appointed for the role.

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

These matters are crucial to ensuring the marriage is carried out in a seemly and legal manner.

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Where a church has no 'appointed person, this proposal would deprive the couple of a full wedding ceremony at the church and necessitate a separate function at a civil wedding venue.

Having a civil registrar at a church for a wedding would facilitate the arrangements and avoid a previous and unnecessary additional civil ceremony. The system works well as it currently stands.

Where a church has a small congregation and no authorised person to officiate at weddings, this proposal poses a danger of the church falling foul of the weddings laws which must be upheld at all times.

Please expand on your answer:

No. They need to be officially recognised as fully capable of understanding the marriage laws. Just being a Clerk in Holy Orders does not mean they have had the appropriate training unless it is made part of their ordination requirements.

Consultation Question 23:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Only if the nominated official has undergone the vetting and training needed to ensure they are capable and fully cognisant of the marriage laws. Otherwise marriages could be celebrated by any person nominated which could lead to breaking the marriage laws.

Consultation Question 24:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Such weddings should be officiated at by a Civil registrar.

Please share your views below:

Yes. This should ensure pseudo organisations could not be registered to officiate at weddings.

Consultation Question 25:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

But only if nominated officiants had had appropriate training and are officially recognised as capable of carrying out the duties.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Yes, of course nothing which is unlawful should be permitted but the wording must ensure that 'public policy or morality' which changes over time does not create a situation where genuinely but not contemporarily popular belief excludes a nominated officiant.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

This would enable those who for whatever reason are unable to use a place of worship for a religious ceremony to have it included in the civil ceremony.

Please share your views below:

Yes, this would give appropriate guidance and probably enable the civil officiant to limit what could become over long religious aspects to the ceremony.

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This provision needs to be retained for the benefit of those who would want it.

Consultation Question 47:

Abolishing this requirement opens up the possibility of more "spur of the moment marriages" which greatly increases the likelihood of people entering into marriage without sufficient consideration and preparation. That in turn increases the likelihood of more failed marriages, which would be painful and damaging in each case.

Remote interviews would increase the likelihood of sham or forced marriages being undetected. There is no substitute for reading body language and the nuances of a situation in person. Remote interviews should therefore not be possible.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Expressing consent orally in person and in front of witnesses is an important part of the legal and social process of marriage. Those requirements should continue to be essential. There should be clear and prescribed wording (it doesn't have to be particularly lengthy) so as the couple and the witnesses present are clear about the seriousness and significance of the marriage ceremony.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This gives far too much freedom for a wedding service to be something irreverent or which trivialises the solemn and lifelong implications of what is being vowed. More structure and some minimum constituents to the marriage vows are needed.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I definitely don't agree. Some locations would be irreverent and entirely inappropriate, such as on someone's grave or underwater. The vows should be made with a degree of seriousness, reflecting the lifelong nature of what is being promised, rather than the vows being detracted from by a couple trying to create an event with an unusual headline or attention seeking venture.

Please share your views below:

Yes the law should limit weddings in certain locations. There is a large difference to a bit of fun in fancy dress and a making a lifelong commitment in the form of marriage.

would the officiant be trained?

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

I wonder what is meant by "contrary to public policy or morality" - as it seems we are in a complete state of flux currently in British society - so that phrase is too vague. Who would decide? Many organisations have beliefs that are deemed unpopular to the wider media..

So NO

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Surely if we want certainty and simplicity, consistency and solemnity - we must have oral acquiescence in the ceremony that is witnessed by society. It must be said that there is no impediment from each participant as that is a legal requirement - why not include that to indicate the importance of these words - not just to include prior to the ceremony

No 2 No - this is not the marriage proposal that can be done anywhere with a bit of creative fun - this is the legal and binding ceremony to be witnessed. (otherwise we could have someone saying yes by flying a flag - or a message behind a 'plane etc)

The ceremony itself MUST have an oral expression of consent - (unless deaf dumb etc)

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Officials can be corrupted - form and ceremony cannot be solely chosen by the parties - there have to be safeguards - otherwise this becomes a parody

Consultation Question 44:

Consultation Question 45:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

It seems odd that we have not allowed readings from scriptures but allowed other poems and prose at a civil ceremony

Please share your views below:

What is meant by "religious content" ? Who defines this?

Anglican preliminaries should continue to be recognised as legal preliminaries to weddings officiated by the Church of England and the Church in Wales;
or

Please expand on your answer:

If people of religious faith desire Anglican preliminaries, this freedom should be permitted them.

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Many churches use and need civil registrars to register weddings, as they do not have their own authorised person e.g. due to few weddings and less familiarity with legal requirements or because it is impractical due to its size.

The Law Commission desires that “the ceremony that is meaningful to the couple should be recognised by law”. Churches that do not have an authorised person can do this at the moment, by having a civil registrar to register the marriage. If this is not allowed anymore, many may require a civil ceremony separate to their church wedding.

Many churches do not have a person authorised to conduct weddings. They can conduct weddings at the moment (using a civil registrar) but will not be able to under the proposals unless they appoint an authorised person, which may be impractical or not possible in all cases.

This idea poses a danger of some churches falling foul of weddings law, as they are required to take responsibility for unfamiliar legalities in order to hold a religious ceremony.

Consultation Question 25:

It should then be confirmed that this group does not hold to polygamous practices where this might be suspected.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

No - this is a VERY dangerous prospect that goes against freedom of conscience and religion. Saying "contrary to public policy or morality" is too subjective and would risk those with unpopular but legal beliefs being excluded from nominating officiants (e.g. those politely opposed to same-sex marriage) just because it goes against "public policy" (which is not always the same as morality). Less controversial criteria might be organisations promoting purposes that support terrorism or the violent overthrow of democracy.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Without the foundation of the short prescribed words, the wedding ceremony can be made fairly meaningless. No words could end up being said between the couple, let alone promises of any kind, but marriage should be based on solemn vows! This could also make coercive marriages more easy. Without these words, marriage might also be treated in a much more casual and not genuine manner. Allowing wholly personalised wedding ceremonies without any legally-required words would send the message that marriage is an entirely private matter when it is also a matter of public and societal concern.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A legal wedding ceremony should reflect the seriousness of the commitment the parties are making rather than being personalised and customised in a way that could trivialise marriage.

Non-legally binding ceremonies can already be as personalised as people want, including one that occurred in a sadomasochism dungeon - this does not reflect the seriousness of marriage. Another involved a couple dressed as hedgehogs, which is not upholding the dignity and solemnity of marriage.

A requirement for officiants to ensure that the ceremony does not undermine the dignity and solemnity of marriage is too subjective and may not prevent couples finding an officiant to agree to even the most outlandish wishes that completely degrade marriage.

The possibility of fully-tailored wedding ceremonies will encourage commercialisation. Those more willing to be flexible with the ceremony would be likely to profit the most, encouraging people to push the boundaries.

If people can entirely customise their own weddings, they might blend together different elements from faith ceremonies inappropriately, effectively making a parody of those ceremonies. This could be highly offensive to people of those faiths! This must by all means not occur.

Consultation Question 44:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Saying 'there should be no legal limitations on who can have those types of weddings' could be problematic if people of those faiths are required to marry people against their conscience e.g. same-sex couples.

Consultation Question 45:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

Just note that the tenets of faiths should not be muddled within ceremonies in a way that could be a parody or misrepresenting those faiths.

Please share your views below:

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There should be freedom to take both, especially if no authorised person is able to legitimise the marriage in a religious setting. If you look at the consultation, churches where no civil registrar would be enabled to conduct the wedding anymore, might need members to have a civil ceremony as well as a religious one if so desired.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The 'open doors' requirement is a valuable aspect that shows that marriage is of societal and public importance, as indeed it is, and not just a private issue.

Ensuring that weddings are open to any member of the public can help to protect against forced marriage and bigamy, for example, and give easier access where this needs to be prevented.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No safeguards have been mentioned that will prevent unsuitable venues being used, and so the dignity of the ceremonies might not be guaranteed.

The consultation does not outline in details how venues will be verified as being 'dignified' and 'safe' and what will constitute venues as being 'dignified' and 'safe'. Venues should enable weddings to be a solemn affair. The Law Commission has made it clear it sees no objection to weddings "in the air", suggesting that the terms 'dignified' and 'safe' could be interpreted very broadly. Unofficial weddings have been conducted e.g. in a sadomasochism dungeon and at a ruined leper hospital on Hallowe'en. Such settings clearly trivialise marriage, and the law must not allow such venues to host legally binding ceremonies. This could be very demeaning, insulting, and degrading for the institution of marriage.

Please share your views below:

This could run the risk of locations being used that degrade the institution of marriage and make it a more private and even coerced affair e.g. if conducted in private homes.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage should be recognised as of public and societal interest and not confined to private guests only; this could run the risk of forced marriages or bigamy occurring.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Please see previous answer (Q29) against independent officiants - these should not be enabled to decide; it could lead to marriage being degraded if due to commercialisation they agree to venues that are not solemn and dignified.

Consultation Question 52:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Please see previous answer (Q29) against independent officiants; they may not all be trusted to agree to only safe and dignified venues; this could be interpreted very broadly.

Chapter 1: Introduction

Consultation Question 1:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I was married in a conventional Church of England wedding ceremony.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I only wanted a 'normal' church wedding. I knew it would be legally recognised.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

There is no point in having a wedding that is not legally binding. It would be a charade and mock genuine marriage. The only place for mock weddings is for drama e.g. plays, films, stage shows where the couple get married every performance and TV programmes. I am however very concerned about non-legally binding Islamic religious marriages. These should be totally illegal and those that promote them prosecuted.

No

Please expand on your answer:

I would not even consider a marriage that is not legally recognised. However, I do understand what you are referring to are related to those that follow the Islamic faith in religious ceremonies that are not legally recognised. Singapore is the best, where every couple first get married at the Registration of Marriages (ROM) for the legal wedding, then have any additional ceremonies in their Mosque, Church or Temple.

Consultation Question 2:

Please share your views below:

I do not see the point of Question 2. Marriage is a serious step and the current law, although in some need of tidying up does not need wholesale reform that mutilates the meaning of marriage. Neither do I see why a wedding would not be meaningful or personal because of the current legal barriers. These legal barriers were put into place for a good reason.

I am not suggesting that we should treat these like the US Constitution which is a fixed absolute document. However, just because many of our marriage laws date back to 1836 with additions in 1949 is not a pretext to change the character of marriage.

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

I am skeptical about aspects of the covid 19 pandemic. As an avid watcher of China news from independent sources, I was aware of covid 19 before it was designated. I had seen what was happening in Wuhan, China that spread to the rest of the world. I have two points about covid 19:

1/ The death rate data is too crude to be meaningful. The mere presence of covid 19 means the death is registered as a covid death. What is missing is the ages of those that have died, if they had significant long term conditions that had weakened their health and CONTRIBUTED to their death.

2/ Is the covid 19 testing recording the VIRAL LOAD. This is important because some testing methods repeatedly amplify the covid 19 to obtain a reading. If this is done too many times e.g. 30 the viral load is insufficient to cause the disease.

Covid 19 is certainly a real disease, but hardly different from SARS and MERS. There is effective treatment available so I feel that the world has to learn to live with the disease until an effective NON LOCKDOWN approach is found to manage covid 19

Consultation Question 4:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a serious step and cannot be done on a whim. 7 days' notice is quite reasonable.

Consultation Question 5:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No, I feel that interview should be done BEFORE the notice period starts. Otherwise, the in-person interview would give the couple very little time to make a life-changing decision.

Consultation Question 6:

another period of time.

Please expand on your answer:

Here I suggest at least a 28 days time period. Ideally, the time period should be longer rather than shorter. In practice, most weddings are planned many months in advance. It is better to make the couple think carefully about what they are doing e.g. getting married, so they do not rush their decision.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

The only safe way is in-person interviews. There should also be a translator present if required. I would also suggest that a video and audio recording is made of the interview. When any doubt about marriage, for sham or forced marriage then the interviewer should be able to suspend their approval and tell the parties that another interview will be needed after they have conducted enquires. Also, the couple is barred from approaching another place to be married.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

Yes, this makes sense because they are both relevant nationals and exempt from immigration control.

Consultation Question 9:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a public declaration of intention to form a lifelong permanent relationship. As such the names of the couple should be publicly displayed. I would suggest the risk of harm clause should be based on substantial evidence of risk. Therefore the presumption should be not to grant non-public status unless the risk of harm is based on evidence e.g. cross-cultural marriage that is opposed.

The play "Romeo and Juliet" portrays a perfect case of where harm was intended. However, it also questions the wisdom of Friar Lawrence in rushing their wedding. At the end of the play, the prince does partly blame him for the deaths of Romeo and Juliet. This play does indeed raise good questions about a marriage where there is opposition, lawful or unlawful.

Consultation Question 10:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I think that once a schedule is obtained, then 12 months is quite sufficient for the couple to get married or change their minds to delay or go in different ways. However, I do oppose your proposed scheme and think the current arrangement is working well.

Consultation Question 11:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

It does appear to be reasonable for a couple to change their minds about who is to marry them and where. However, I still think the current system of linking marriage to particular locations e.g. National Trust property, church, or synagogue is better than the officiant scheme you are proposing.

Consultation Question 12:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I disagree with the whole officiant approach. Marriage is special so should be limited to 'special' places to show that it is a solemn commitment. Currently, I believe that another minister or registrar can step in to replace the registrar/minister that is not available.

Please share your views below:

I have no view on this question. However, I do oppose your proposed scheme and think the current arrangement is working well.

Consultation Question 13:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The marriage banns are traditional and tell the world that a wedding is to take place. It gives people the right (apart from special weddings such as those between royals) to attend the ceremony. A wedding is a public celebration that is for the community to witness, even if the wedding celebrations are only for invited guests. The Church of England is a very special organisation, and should keep its privileges.

Consultation Question 14:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I oppose the removal of old legislation even if it appears to be redundant. However, I do oppose your proposed scheme and think the current arrangement is working well.

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

The publishing of banns of marriage is important. Were it only in the church to be used for the ceremony, the news of an expected marriage would not spread around the parish if their several churches.

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

I think the current system where the registrar of marriages is responsible for checking the documentation is a good approach. However, yes, I do think that if they want more reassurance, they should be able to call for more evidence.

I also consider that the minister should meet the couple separately before banns are published.

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

The need for separate declarations would be an additional safeguard. So yes, they should be required.

Consultation Question 18:

Anglican preliminaries should continue to be recognised as legal preliminaries to weddings officiated by the Church of England and the Church in Wales; or

Please expand on your answer:

I am in favour of the Church of England and Church of Wales keeping their current arrangements. Some time ago I lived in a country where all weddings were preceded by civil preliminaries. Couples were married in a civil ceremony first then any additional services in a mosque, temple or church followed the legal marriage. I do promote the Singapore model later in this consultation, but only to prevent marriage ceremonies from being devalued to theme park 'fun' experiences.

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I am uneasy at the idea of officiants replacing registrars. It is changing the role because a registrar can only conduct a ceremony in a designated place, but an officiant is not limited to designated places.

Consultation Question 20:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Registration officers are by definition non-faith and therefore restricted to civil marriages.

Consultation Question 21:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This makes total sense. Why should more be needed?

Consultation Question 22:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This appears to be reasonable provided it does not undermine the role of the clergy that currently conduct weddings.

Consultation Question 23:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I still feel that a registrar should be present at weddings. This idea of these officiants will widen the scope of those conducting services and could undermine standards. Quality and consistency should be maintained.

I am totally against the idea of non-religious officiants. Just imagine that the fictional "friends of aliens" wanted to conduct an 'alien wedding' ceremony. Here I appreciate that an 'alien wedding' may not be allowed on decent grounds and that this would make marriage little more than a theatrical show, but my main point is this would make a mockery of marriage.

There is nothing wrong if this imaginary couple went to a registry office for a normal 'decent' civil ceremony and then have their weird alien ceremony in their fictional "friends of aliens" venue!

What I have just described is the law in Singapore where every marriage is carried out at the Registration of Marriage then couples can choose a faith ceremony afterward. For the UK a non-faith ceremony would not be the official marriage but the couple could organise whatever they want afterward!

Consultation Question 24:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I am totally against the idea of non-religious officiants. Just imagine that the fictional "friends of aliens" wanted to conduct an 'alien wedding' ceremony. Here I appreciate that an 'alien wedding' may not be allowed on decent grounds because dressing up like aliens would make marriage into a theatre show but my main point is this would make a mockery of marriage.

There is nothing wrong if this imaginary couple went to a registry office for a normal 'decent' civil ceremony and then have their weird alien ceremony in their fictional "friends of aliens" venue!

What I have just described is the law in Singapore where every marriage is carried out at the Registration of Marriage then couples can choose a faith ceremony afterward.

Marriage is not a performance where the groom is dressed as prince charming and the bride as Cinderella in her ball gown, Disney style. It is OK to have Disney characters at the wedding, but not as part of the ceremony.

Please share your views below:

This is a difficult question because I totally reject that a non-religious belief organisation should be able to connect weddings. That aside, there are many frivolous organisations such as the classic "flat earth society" which exist just for fun. My main concern is with more serious organisations such as Humanists who really want to be considered a non-theistic faith. The same applies to Atheists, Mother Earth worshippers, Druids, and Climate Change believers.

The point is where does one start and stop with non-religious belief organisations.

Consultation Question 25:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is too low for religious organisations. I feel that it would be better to carry on with the registrar supervising the leader e.g. pastor conducting the marriage.

I totally object to non-religious organisations being given the opportunity to appoint an officiant. Members of non-religious organisations can have a civil wedding at a registry office and then do whatever they want for their 'non-religious' ceremony. I say this because this part is NOT the wedding.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

This is a dangerous question. Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. The answer is a resounding NO to this question. It should not be the government that prevents the 'officiant' or 'registrar' from being appointed but the government to prove that the 'officiant' or 'registrar' was acting in an unlawful, contrary to public policy or offending morality. I can foresee that Pentecostal and Evangelical churches could easily be banned from appointing officiants because they will not marry same-sex couples. This situation has already occurred in a European country. The clergy would not marry same-sex couples, so their government preventing them from holding any weddings at all! What is lawful or unlawful can easily change, public policy can easily change and morality is very fluid so highly changeable. My point is the last three conditions give the government too much power when deciding who can conduct weddings based on their organisation.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. However, to answer your question, I feel that if the change to officiants is made, then it total sense to nominate by both office held and as individuals. I also see that when someone leaves an office, as opposed to an 'individual' personal appointment as an officiant, the question arises as to if they keep their officiant status? This could potentially create two different classes of officiants.

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. However, it does seem sensible to maintain the register at the General Register Office.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. I assume that the state will continue to civil provide weddings if the officiant scheme is adopted. To these will be added religious officiants e.g. mosque, temple, or church. Therefore I fail to see the need for independent officiants. Couples have the choice of a civil ceremony or a religious ceremony. What additional role could independent officiants play? I see no need to add confusion to create a new 'professional' officiant, separate from those in the registry of marriage places for wedding ceremonies.

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. However, I broadly agree with the need for an officiant to be "fit and proper persons". This would only be valid on appointment and not thereafter because a person can be 'fit and proper' to begin with and then become 'unfit and improper' over a period of time. It is unfair for any organisation to keep checking on staff. The BBC certainly did not check Jimmy Savile et al and almost any organisation can have a 'good' person with a dark secret in their midst.

Consultation Question 31:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. What you list above is common sense if independent officiants are created. I have some additional points. I think that 21 should be the minimum age, not 18. Secondly, the words "fit and proper" is too vague and imprecise, so open to interpretation. I can foresee a situation where Christians are not seen as "fit and proper" persons because the criteria used to determine what is fit and proper would be written by Stonewall et al including, transgender pressure groups, so include the marriage of same-sex couples and transgender people. What I am saying is not nonsense. In my lifetime, particularly since the 1997 Labour government, drastic social changes have taken place. For the avoidance of doubt, the new 1997 government incorporated rather than caused these changes. Generally, prior to this governments held it was their moral duty to uphold traditional, which are really biblical-based values.

Consultation Question 32:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. This is an odd question, but I will respond. Currently, ministers in the Church of England (CoE) are paid a fee for conducting a wedding, but this is really an 'overtime' payment for extra work. I interpret the situation you set out as profiting from 'star' status like a show business star performer. My response is a clear "no" to this rule because it dealing with a hypothetical situation that does not currently exist. Those who marry couples should only do so as part of their role or office that they hold. It is not right for couples to be able to choose their minister or in your terms officiant because marriage is NOT a show, but a very serious step.

Consultation Question 33:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. This is legal mumbo jumbo. It is wrong to create independent officiants because this will encourage a "Britain's got talent" mentality. Here I do not criticise the show, which can be good! What I mean is conducting weddings will become a stage act, creating celebrity officiants. All this would do is devalue marriage to that of the final act of "Annie Get Your Gun" double wedding. Great musical and I love to watch fictional weddings, my favorite being the 1968 "Romeo and Juliet" Franco Zeffirelli film. My point is weddings are not 'staged' events but have already become so even under current arrangements. This will only get worse if your proposal is accepted.

Consultation Question 34:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. For reasons of simplicity, it may be easier for a church to have its ministers as independent officiants than those tied to their organisation or due to their office. The end result would be the same. However, I am strongly against the idea of independent officiants because they are unnecessary.

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. Now, I 110% agree with this proposal. Now, in my view, it needs to go a lot further to clarify what the words "uphold the dignity and solemnity of marriage" mean. Imagine if a nudist club thought that given they are nudists, what is wrong with a nudist wedding provided everyone involved consents to it happening. In this instant, the current law forbids such, but would this still be the case under the proposed arrangements? To those nudists involved it would be dignified and solemn. If the officiant was one of their members, they would also regard it as dignified and solemn. My point is that the words solemn and dignified need very careful clarification to avoid my hypothetical nudist wedding situation. In more practical terms this would apply to places, activities, and dress standards (or lack of it). There must be crystal clear rules to define what is and what is not acceptable to uphold the dignity and solemnity of marriage.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. Yes, I do agree that the General Register Offices should issue guidance to all officiants on how weddings should be conducted. In Question 35 I set out my argument about the topic of what this should consist of. My main point is the guidance has to be comprehensive, detailed, and cover all eventualities. There should also be scope for adding and deleting guidance based on new developments.

Consultation Question 37:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. Yes, the organisation that nominated them is their first line of quality control. I would add that any person unhappy with the ceremony should be able to directly raise any issues. This does not mean every minor point is a failure or frivolous or vexatious complaints should be held against the officiant. Not everything that goes wrong at a wedding is the fault of the minister, registrar and if your proposal is taken forward, the officiant.

Consultation Question 38:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. Yes, there has to be controls under your proposed arrangements. However, I can foresee situations where the General Register Office needs a legal check on its authority. What if the General Register Office decided that every officiant had to conduct same-sex weddings and banned all Christian officiants from performing weddings?

Consultation Question 39:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. Yes, there has to be controls under your proposed arrangements. However, I can foresee situations where the General Register Office needs a legal check on its authority. What if the General Register Office decided that every officiant had to conduct same-sex weddings and banned all Christian officiants from performing weddings?

Consultation Question 40:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. However, I think that 21 years of age is a better minimum. One more point, officiants should have the option to either pause or resign their status. Let me explain. It should be possible for someone to voluntarily pause their status and reactivate it later, subject to updating their practice. Also, it should be possible for someone to resign and permanently end their officiant status.

Consultation Question 41:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Firstly, I am against the notion of 'officiants' and support the current registrars. Please look at Question 40 for the full answer that covers this point. Continuing Professional Development (CPD) has become a millstone around the neck of many people in the professions and vocations e.g. nursing. CPD has degenerated into a 'tick box' exercise. CPD does not guarantee the quality of service and performance. If your proposal is modest and minimal then why use the term CPD? It will also increase the cost of holding weddings because of the time, materials, and 'evidence' gathering. By the way, I understand CPD and have seen it at work in different workplaces and professions. It is not the ideal solution to every profession and situation. There are better ways to maintain and raise professional and vocational standards that avoid the 'tick box' approach. In general, this would lead to overregulation and higher costs for no gain in quality and consistency.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This reform will obliterate any standard form of the marriage ceremony. At least something remained of Hiroshima after the air burst atomic bomb on 06/08/1945 but NOTHING will remain of a standard form of the marriage ceremony in this proposal. Signing a schedule of marriage is quite insufficient because they may be married online! Traditional words are also legally required words in both religious and civil ceremonies. What these words do is emphasise the solemnity of marriage, so are important. In the current ceremony, the minister or registrar can provide a wide degree of personalisation to suit the couple, so there is no need to abolish the current approach. Generally, what I am saying is a wedding is NOT a showbiz event but a public declaration that they understand the seriousness of marriage. A wedding also asks others to support them, particularly family members to stay together. This is in the 1662 Book of Common Prayer service.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No, a wedding should have a standard form to be legally acceptable. I feel that a wedding is a very serious commitment, and is a public demonstration to wider society that they have accepted the joys and sorrows of being joined and becoming one flesh. Fantasy weddings already exist and I have nothing against them provided they are TOTALLY SEPARATED from real-world weddings. Some of my favourite weddings are from Japanese anime shows where wonderful fantasy elements add to the magic of the wedding. Makoto from Kannon is the saddest wedding, but I digress from my main point. The wedding service has to be constrained to the required standards to prevent Alice in Wonderland situations becoming the new 'norm'. In practical terms, it would drastically add to already astronomically high cost of weddings. God intended marriage to be simple and serious and not a Disneyland fantasy show. There was originally no marriage ceremony but coming together after a time of betrothal.

Consultation Question 44:

No

Please expand on your answer:

All these groups are Judeo Christian and have very firm traditions based on the bible. Jews do not include the New Testament, but all the traditions followed by all groups come from the Old Testament. A religious wedding is highly symbolic in both words and actions. It is a PUBLIC event for the whole community to witness God joining together a MAN and a WOMAN to become one flesh. God commands them to be fruitful and multiply. A wedding service is not an opportunity for individuality and showing off, although this can be a problem. A religious wedding is a declaration before God to the whole world that the couple has accepted the blessed state of matrimony. My point is the formalities of marriage have to be maintained to a wedding service meaning. Also, giving this freedom would encourage rebellion in the LBGTQ+ friendly parts of some denominations to change the wedding service to suit their radical ideology.

Consultation Question 45:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There should be a great divide between a civil and religious wedding ceremony. Every couple is free to choose either type of wedding ceremony. I can see no gain in combining the religious and civil elements. There is also the risk that by doing so, it would give a government the opportunity to outlaw religious weddings if e.g. churches and Syngogues refused to marry same-sex couples. The government could simply say that you can still get married with some (watered down) religious ceremony.

Please share your views below:

I set out my views in Question 45. It is not just a matter of "religious" content but the whole concept of a religious wedding ceremony. A religious wedding is a faith-based ceremony from its roots. Every point of the ceremony has a faith-based reason for inclusion. There are differences between the Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and Protestant wedding services, but all are totally expressions of faith. My point is that it is impossible to combine a secular and religious wedding ceremony.

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I support the Singapore model IF this is the only way to get married. Most couples only have a civil ceremony at the Registration of Marriage building. However, those who have faith then hold an additional service to fulfill their faith-based obedience to their God or gods. Hence, I say NO to this proposal because it works well because many couples only have a 'plain' civil ceremony without special wedding clothes and save the 'special' clothes e.g. bridal dress for the religious service. There is nothing in the bible to say that having a civil and religious service is wrong. It meets the requirements of God and Ceasar!

For the avoidance of doubt, I support the current system and reject the proposals by the Law Commission. It is only in the context of mixing faith and civil wedding ceremonies where I support the Singapore solution.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There is a good reason for requiring that doors are open for weddings. Historically forced weddings are not new, and those that object have had to be able to enter the church to raise their objection to a marriage. Forced marriage is a major problem today that is in my opinion being under-reported due to political correctness and fear of being branded as a racist! In other words, the bride or groom must be free to walk out of their own wedding service. It has happened before in real life, not just in fictional dramas. The only weddings that should be excluded are state events such as royal weddings where the constitutional protocol demands 'ranking' of attendees. I also feel that people should not view marriage as a private matter. In one sense it is a private decision between a man and woman, plus family discouragement or encouragement. However, everyone is entitled to witness their wedding ceremony because marriage is a vow [even if not verbally stated] before God to be faithful to each other. God grants blessing on the marriage between a man and a woman. The union of the couple is a public event.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Weddings are a solemn occasion and need a fittingly solemn location. I am in favour of the current wider range of officially registered places for marriages such as the National Trust house I visited just prior to wedding taking place. It was a dignified place for a marriage to take place. However, the couple SHOULD NOT be able to choose wherever they want. The law is quite flexible about the places that can apply for a license to be places where marriages can be performed. All of these are dignified. There are some problems for churches that do not own their own premise that would benefit from a limited revision of the current law. What I am saying is a review where there are problems such as the one I have just mentioned, but not extending the type of venues that can apply to hold weddings. Some control is needed otherwise in the words of the famous song "anything goes".

Please share your views below:

My answer to this question is "ALL OF THE ABOVE". I will discuss the unsuitability of the first three, then in a private home last. The first three "outdoors", "on inland waters such as lakes or rivers and "in the air", are not dignified places for couples to get married. Instead, they are places for couples to indulge in their interests. I can imagine a wedding of two rock climbers on a rock climbing route. It would not be dignified because climbing equipment is for a sport, not getting married in. I could say the same about skydivers being married in the air, which is allowed in some countries. Yes, it may be more fun for the participants but marriage is a serious commitment and should not be made into a spectacle to make a memorable video of. In any case, a mock wedding is possible in these places or anywhere else for that matter. Recall that in Singapore couples MUST marry at the Registration of Marriages first, then any other ceremony can take place afterward. This is why I object to all four on your list. Private homes are out, because the public need access. This is already an issue with some wedding venues.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

All venues need to be publicly accessible, royal weddings excepted because they are covered in TV so are accessible. Recall that I have argued that forced marriages are not a new phenomenon. This is why the banns of marriage are read, and different residency requirements are in place to prevent forced marriage. Forced marriage did not start with the Asian community but they are currently the main source of the problem. More needs to be done to protect Asian girls from such exploitation in the UK. Keeping doors open means the public can observe such weddings by preventing 'behind closed doors' marriages. For private property, access is already a problem. The National Trust House could not allow me to watch the wedding that was shortly going to take place. Was this a forced wedding? I have no idea because the doors of the house were shut to visitors and only open to the bride, groom, and wedding guests. OK, it was unlikely to be a forced wedding, given its high cost, but it was behind closed doors.

Consultation Question 50:

Yes

Yes

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Religious belief places of worship should be protected from access from both civil weddings and non-religious belief weddings. Imagine if a coven of witches was allowed to use a Christian church for a Wiccan wedding service. Wicca is a real faith and really does have a wedding ritual. Satanic symbols would be placed in a Christian church, satanic rituals used including curses on Christianity. OK, this is an extreme example but if the culture of 'rights' is followed through to its conclusion, non-religious belief groups will demand access to churches for their weddings. Some of what I have speculated about is already about to happen in other 'liberal' countries where if a church will not allow same-sex weddings, it has prevented them from holding weddings for heterosexual couples. A church is a holy place, even if does not have the same significance as the Temple of the Lord in bible times.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The primary responsibility for where a wedding can take place should be clearly set out in crystal clear lists of approved and non-approved locations. The officiant's role is to make sure the choice of the couple getting married is firstly legally allowed, then if there is a grey area, in consultation with the Register of Marriage office. It must not be left to the officiant because then a wider and wider range of places to get married will occur through inconsistent application of the rules. By the time action, official action is taken, the range of wedding venues will be so established only the most unsuitable will be taken off the list. This is called pushing the limits and rarely does any official body step in to fully enforce the law. Then the grey areas because greater and greater until it's impossible to return to the original standard.

Consultation Question 52:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Consider my statement "winter walking is quite safe in the Scottish mountains". Safe here is too vague and lacks clarity and certainty. It all depends on who is doing the walking, how well they are trained and equipped, and an element of luck! Say the wedding was on the top of Ben Nevis in winter. Would it be safe for the officiant, couple, and witnesses? Yes if they were all climbers and walkers used to winter conditions but lethal for everybody else! Now the setting would not be dignified standing in below freezing point temperatures, probably low visibility, and at least a three-hour trek up and back after the ceremony. What I have suggested is a mad idea, but shows that the words "safe" and "dignified" are very subjective. This issue needs clarity and stringent safeguards.

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is the role of Parliament to clearly set the rules for the definitions of "safe" and "dignified", not the General Register Office. Hear me out on this. Too often Parliament has allowed too much scope for other organisations to interpret the law. The General Register Office may be reliable and do its duty, but is not designed to decide the definitions of "safe" and "dignified". A lot of thought needs to go into defining these terms so it is not vague or open to interpretation. Ideas change over time, so will the ideas behind the definitions of "safe" and "dignified" which Parliament should update. My point is a body such as the General Register Office should not have the delegated responsibility for deciding what Parliament intends. Parliament should set the standard for the General Register Office to apply.

Consultation Question 53:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, for wedding venues that are indeed "safe" and "dignified" such as a hotel or National Trust house there is no reason why they cannot be pre-approved. My point is that this is how the current system works. So in my view, the old maxim "If it ain't broke, don't fix it" should prevail.

Please share your views below:

Like now, a "safe" and "dignified" wedding venue should be able to apply for pre-approval to the General Register Office. Once they have inspected the venue then it should be added to a list kept by the General Register Office and open for couples and officials to view.

Chapter 8: Registration

Consultation Question 54:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, provided this is the current requirement of a Church of England wedding certificate.

Consultation Question 55:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I feel that documents should be bilingual for clarity. This would apply to all languages other than English. The officiant or minister should be able to accurately write in both languages and indeed, conduct ceremonies in both languages.

Consultation Question 56:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Electronic registration is an invitation to hacking, fraud and worse. I strongly feel that marriage records should always remain in paper form using the special ink and paper that lasts a lot longer than a human lifetime.

Chapter 10: Validity and offences

Consultation Question 57:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, provided it meets the current requirements of the law and nothing is omitted.

No

Please expand on your answer:

No, however, I am not familiar with the current legal situation. However, it is evident that mistakes cannot be tolerated in the legal aspects of marriage documentation. That said if there is a way to correct genuine errors due to unforeseen circumstances without performing another marriage ceremony then so be it.

My point is the requirements of the law should be kept and exceptions can only be allowed with good reason. For example, if the bride fainted after her wedding then she cannot sign. I am less tolerant about the case of the missing witness as if any doubt more witnesses should be present at the ceremony. My golden rule would be if there is an error, something suspicious has occurred until a rational, legally standing explanation can be given.

Consultation Question 58:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, the law must not allow a non-qualifying ceremony to be registered as a legal marriage. I am troubled about religious-only ceremonies. Let me explain. In the Singapore system, every couple has to marry under civil marriage at the Registration of Marriages (ROM) building. Singapore is a small island so one ROM location is sufficient. Then every Christian, Islamic and Tamil wedding is a religious-only ceremony. Here in the UK I feel that religious-only ceremonies should be unlawful. I know this mainly impacts the Muslim community. Every marriage ceremony conducted should be a FULL LEGAL UK MARRIAGE. This may appear to be harsh toward any community, whatever their race, religion, or colour but this is a point of principle. Currently, many Christian marriage ceremonies are conducted with a registrar present to qualify the marriage. I am sure the same is true for those married in a temple, mosque, or synagogue. There is one law for everybody and no place for conducting a non-qualifying ceremony apart from countries like Singapore that operate under a different system.

Consultation Question 59:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No, all depends on why they have not cohabited for any period after its celebration. During wartime e.g. WW1 and WW2 many such marriages were conducted and were fully accepted. There can be reasons why a couple is separated which are fully valid reasons for full acceptance. However, in general, cohabitation is the purpose of marriage so non-cohabitation raises a giant red flag that something is wrong. I am not a lawyer familiar with the law of marriage but will offer my views. If a man loves a woman and a woman loves a man they will want to cohabit. This may not necessarily include the immediate 'normal' sexual relationship to consummate their marriage. However, it does mean sleeping and living together as man and wife.

No

Please expand on your answer:

Mere cohabitation is insufficient to establish a marriage. Here I am not taking a moral viewpoint that living together is immoral. I am saying that marriage requires documentation before the ceremony, a ceremony, and the signing of legal documents after the service. I understand that there can be difficulty to determine cases when asylum seekers and refugees are involved. For example, the USA uses DNA to check if accompanied children really belong to their claimed parents.

Consultation Question 60:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, forced marriage is a major problem and often girls are trapped in another country with different laws to the UK before they are brought to the UK. A person who claims a lack of consent should not be time limited.

Consultation Question 61:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, an officiant (under your proposals) must be totally honest and upright. This is why I prefer the current system because the risk of this happening is almost zero. Registrars know their duties and ministers of the Church of England know what to do. The proposed officiant's method will inevitably lead to abuse and problems.

Chapter 11: Special types of wedding

Consultation Question 62:

Please share your views below:

No comments apart from the system has to be flexible to respond when the couple needs expediting a faster service when required or to adapt to difficult circumstances.

Consultation Question 63:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No, this may be an emergency. However, the legal formalities need to be completed in double fast time. It will not be a method that will be used unless extreme circumstances are involved.

Consultation Question 64:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I am not keen on the idea of a schedule issued by registration officers replacing the current system.

Consultation Question 65:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I am not keen on the new idea of marriage schedules. However, I think that 12 months is a good period.

Consultation Question 66:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I am not keen on the new idea of marriage schedules. However, I think that 12 months is a good period.

Consultation Question 67:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I disagree with the whole idea of remote signings. It is possible that a national emergency could occur, but I am suspicious of government intentions. The covid 19 crisis has been abused by many countries to impose new forms of control and suspension of liberties. Hence my empathic NO to points 1, 2, 3, and 4. Online weddings via a zoom like application are an abomination. All matters dealing with marriage should be in person, not online.

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is a case of not allowing a crisis to go to waste. In other words, I have no trust in the government based on what has happened with covid 19, earlier terrorist threats e.g. IRA and other situations. Emergency provisions are should only be available in a true emergency and even then lightly used.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, provided the hospital can provide sufficient proof. This is not difficult to obtain from medical records.

Consultation Question 68:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No. Weddings at sea are unnecessary for near territorial waters. This is an extension of the locations a wedding can take place.

No. Weddings at sea are unnecessary for international waters. This is an extension of the locations a wedding can take place.

No. Weddings at sea are unnecessary for international waters. This is an extension of the locations a wedding can take place.

Consultation Question 72:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No. This is an extension of the locations a wedding can take place. Ships captains and deck officers did not routinely marry people in the past. The place for planned weddings is on dry land, not a glamorous cruise ship holiday.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

There is no need for independent officiants, so no need for weddings on cruise ships. Other counties can continue to offer them, but they change the whole point of a wedding from a solemn ceremony to a showbiz experience. That is the problem with your whole proposal, it transforms marriage into something like an 'experience day' driving a supercar or balloon trip. God created marriage to be sacred and special, not a 'Disney' prince/princess experience. The point of marriage is it's solemn and intended to be so.

This is an administrative point.

Chapter 12: Fees

Consultation Question 75:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No, a standard fee for everyone

Consultation Question 76:

(2) a separate fee from other forms of giving notice, set nationally on compassionate grounds at below cost level.

Please expand on your answer:

(2) as these are special cases that must show compassion

Consultation Question 77:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I support the current registrar scheme for civil weddings. There is no need for officiants to be created! In fact, I sometimes, but not always think the Singapore model is the best where every couple has to firstly marry at a civil ceremony then have a faith or other type of ceremony afterward. Certainly, many couples do not want the expense of hiring a 'posh' wedding venue and are quite happy with the existing registry office facilities.

Consultation Question 78:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This safe and dignified proposal is ridiculous. What is wrong with the current system that is very flexible with licensed venues such as historic houses and exclusive hotels for those who want a different setting. We already have safe and dignified venues for weddings to be conducted. What you are proposing would merely add cost and discourage marriage. In fact, most of the new freedoms in marriage ceremonies you are proposing would massively increase the cost of getting married. To my mind, what is needed is COST REDUCTIONS to prevent competition for the 'grandest wedding'.

Consultation Question 79:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes to pre-approval, as per the existing system where licensed wedding venues are available for civil weddings. No to any additional cost.

Consultation Question 80:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The cost should be the same for all weddings apart from a reduced fee where compassion is needed e.g. very ill patient getting married.

Consultation Question 81:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No, there is too much 'wriggle room' in the innocent term "cost recovery basis". Weddings are important and must not become a money-making enterprise for local authorities.

Consultation Question 82:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No, same fee as for a standard civil ceremony at a registrar's office.

Consultation Question 83:

(2) there should be no fee.

Please expand on your answer:

(2) this is a tragic situation and no fee should be charged. The two people getting married know what is ahead and should be given the gift of a free of charge marriage.

Consultation Question 84:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I oppose the officiants scheme. This is going to be money-making scheme that will give the monopoly for training and CPD to an approved organisation. Currently, registrars are trained at public expense and Church of England ministers are also trained by their employer. The only outcome of the officiants scheme will be increased costs to get married.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

1/ There is nothing in the current law that discourages marriage. The points that are raised to support the idea that current laws are restrictive miss the 'elephant in the room'. This metaphorical elephant is the strict requirements in the current law are to protect the institution of marriage, not discourage marriage. Marriage is a serious step and should be treated as such.

2/ The reasons why couples do not get married are varied. A major factor is that marriage no longer confers automatic benefits such as a meaningful married tax allowance, priority in housing, etc. In Singapore and other European countries marriage grants privileges that are material and support marriage over cohabitation. Currently, single parents are granted preferential treatment over married couples in areas such as housing, social security payments e.g. universal credit, and income support. Your proposals will increase the cost of weddings and will only benefit those who can afford a 'posh' wedding.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

From my understanding of the situation, there is a range of options open to couples depending on their budget and if they want a religious service. In my view, the cost of the wedding is fully under the control of the couple getting married, it is they that make the choices. 1/ and 3/ are the cheapest options, 2/ is more expensive. I cannot comment on 4/ and 5/. My main point is simply even if all wedding ceremonies were free, social pressures to outdo the Joneses jack up the total cost of a wedding. The cost of the ceremony is NOT a significant cost unless it is tied to hiring an exclusive venue.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

Again, the current arrangements are very good. Most places of worship do not charge anything like the commercial rate for a 'posh' National Trust wedding venue. The Registry office is also good value for money. There is no need for all this fuss about 'safe and dignified' and 'pick and mix' (think choosing sweets) approach. In my view, your proposals promise the moon and in practice only give the rich additional benefits, because they can AFFORD to make their weddings special. In reality, all most couples want is a basic wedding with one or two frills. Also, the current economic climate is making the wedding so expensive (not the ceremony itself) cohabitation is often chosen with marriage deferred to when they can afford it!

Consultation Question 87:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

I will only comment on 4/. Marriage should not be looked at from a business opportunity point of view. However, being practical about things, business is always involved to a greater or lesser extent. I see no problem in offering a wider choice of 'wedding services' to couples that have the financial means to 'put on a do'. However, the main problem is that people's expectation of weddings is often beyond the means of the couple and their families. Hence the business opportunities you speak of are very limited and would only benefit a select number of high worth locations. That said, I doubt if the marriage rate in the UK, in general, will increase. Marriage is already a very middle-class institution apart from those with faith. The financial benefits of cohabitation or some form of part-time cohabitation are so great for everybody apart from the wealthy. If marriage was supported by the state as it is in Singapore and other European countries such as Hungary, then yes, the marriage rate would increase.

Consultation Question 88:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

I have no comments on Question 88.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

I see zero benefits to local authorities. There would be an increase in bureaucracy and higher fee income for the same number of weddings. These two would cancel each other out.

Consultation Question 89:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

I see no problem if a couple chooses to get married in another jurisdiction. My only point is that it has to be legally accepted in the UK and not all countries of the world meet this standard. Singapore for example will not recognise same-sex marriages. This has been tried and the Singapore government has firmly said "no" to their marriage certificate. Singapore is not alone as many countries will not accept same-sex overseas marriage. Where someone gets married also affects overseas adoption of children.

I see the drift of this question. The idea is wedding cruises will benefit the UK maritime sector because they are big business in other parts of the world. The UK lacks the sun and glitz of the Caribbean so I do not see it as being a winner.

Consultation Question 91:

Please share your views below:

I have [REDACTED] some ideas to contribute.

1/ Reorganisation of the current arrangements will add costs mainly to local authorities who will need to expand their capabilities. This will have to be recouped from increased fees for services.

2/ I see some high-end prime locations getting more business, but do not see it as having any benefits for most businesses.

3/ Not much change apart from higher costs imposed on them adopting the new system.

4/ Additional expenses that will be recoped from couples. For example, Deck Officers will become officiants but their real job will remain running the ship.

5/ Couples will be the greatest losses from this reform. At every turn, they will face increased costs for what is for most the same services as the current

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The couple are to make a public declaration in a place where it can be challenged if untrue [very rare] but the witness of others is required to recognise and celebrate support...

Anything else is to undermine the point of the declaration as they could say anything without it being verified/witnessed...

The currently understood church format contains all the safeguards and yet can be changed into an intimate celebration for the couple [families concerned]

Civil Marriages currently mimic this in a "non" religious way.

Non conformist churches have a registrar present to ensure the legal and dignified requirements are compleeted and the correct registration takes place

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

the requirement of the wedding are to ensure everything is taken seriously - so as a previous question implies there must be dignity and the community norms are required...

there can be a to of flexibility in the promises and statements made....

BUT the commitment to love and serve should be made in such a way as show that divorce is not the backstop - it is a lifelong commitment [not to be taken lightly]

Consultation Question 2:

Please share your views below:

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

Approximately 500 (33%) of our Historic Houses member properties are wedding venues, and income from these weddings is essential to help to pay for maintenance and repair at these irreplaceable heritage sites (the majority of which are Grade I or Grade II* listed). Covid related wedding restrictions since March have led to thousands of cancellations and postponements, with the decision to reduce wedding numbers from 30 down to 15 in England alone leading to an estimated £750m of losses. Weddings make a meaningful contribution to millions of people's lives, and support a vast ecology of SME businesses, often in otherwise fragile rural economies. Yet the weddings industry has been chronically overlooked by government support packages, and wedding venues have not been eligible for any of the cultural sector grants that have been provided so far.

The plight of couples whose wedding event had been disrupted during the pandemic featured frequently in the media during the summer of 2020. The Competition and Markets Authority chose to make weddings one of just three specific priorities for investigation (along with holiday accommodation and nurseries) in relation to cancellation and refund policies (see statement issued 30 April 2020). The CMA's own data, however, suggest that weddings were the subject of a very small minority of complaints it received (more than half the complaints the CMA received had related to holidays, not weddings).

The CMA published guidance for weddings businesses on 7 September 2020, setting out its view on how requests by couples for refunds should be treated. This guidance put an emphasis on consumers being offered "full refunds" in instances where lockdown laws had prevented a wedding from going ahead on the agreed date. At the same time however the CMA's guidance freely acknowledged that "the wedding business may, however, be able to withhold certain limited amounts relating to expenses it has already incurred in respect of the wedding".

In the case of Bijou Weddings, the CMA determined that "37.2% of the contract price was the maximum amount Bijou could deduct from its refunds to any customer". The CMA later (26 November 2020) issued a clarification to explain that 37.2% was an upper limit, and that on average Bijou had been able to retain 28% of customer deposits in respect of costs. So, the insistence made by the CMA on 7 September that "full [eg 100%] refunds" were owed had become an acceptance, by 26 November, that 72% (rather than 100%) refunds were acceptable (in the particular case of Bijou) and that each wedding contract should anyway be considered on its own merits. The incorrect and contradictory statements issued by the Competition and Markets Authority – a Government-sponsored public agency – added significantly to the woes faced by wedding venues throughout 2020.

Some of our members have provided testimonies of the impact Covid-19 has had on their weddings businesses this year:

'Penton Park were due to host 15 weddings this year, all of which had to be rescheduled and were seeking full refunds. This December, the £2500 licence fee was due for renewal, alongside over £15,000 in essential repairs and maintenance to our listed building - this would all have been funded by the weddings. After the government's announcement regarding weddings being limited to 15 people, we made the decision to cancel all our weddings and refund over £65,000 of deposits. We are presently pivoting our business as we do not believe that viable wedding income will resume for the duration of 2021, and certainly not for the peak summertime months - meaning another year of little to no income. Having been listed as one of the top 30 venues in the country this really has been devastating for us. We qualified for the £10,000 local authority support grant but we've received no other support in this area.'

'The impact of the pandemic and the closure of the wedding business has been disastrous for Tissington Hall, a Grade II* listed building in the Peak District. We have had to postpone 35 weddings to 2021 and beyond, blocking up the potential for new business in the future. Ten months on some brides are cancelling and asking for deposits back, which makes things even harder. We estimate to have lost gross fees of around £200,000, which when added to the commissions, accommodation bookings and associated traders' income (florists, taxi firms, cake makers) means a grand estimate of over £500,000 lost to the local rural economy.'

'Covid 19 restrictions have been disastrous for weddings at Browsholme Hall, Lancashire. Since March 2020 over 70 weddings have been postponed or cancelled. The annual revenue needed to protect the heritage has therefore been zero in 2020, with consequent impact on staffing and repairs. The Law Commission's proposal to allow ceremonies other than in registered locations is warmly welcomed by both our existing and new couples.'

Consultation Question 45:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes. The strict division between religious and civil ceremonies can be highly limiting for both couples and venues, and the strict existing rules around religious readings, music, and iconography do not account for flexible spiritual beliefs. Many modern couples would like the opportunity to include a Christian blessing or hymn within a civil ceremony (for example) whilst not having a full Anglican service, but currently are forced to choose between secular civil weddings and religious church weddings.

Consultation Question 47:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes. Our members' wedding venues are located on private property where it is often not safe or practical to allow general public access during ceremonies. Couples seeking private venues should be permitted to have fully private weddings.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes. There is a significant interest in open-air weddings and more unusual locations, and our members are keen to offer a variety of beautiful settings which they are currently unable to license under existing laws. Historic houses and gardens are well placed to cater to this demand, featuring romantic settings such as parks, gardens, lakes, combined with the elegant indoor spaces that couples are looking for. This would also allow more venues to engage in the current demand for 'rustic' weddings, and would be an opportunity for important but underused and at risk structures such as historic follies, barns, and stables to be restored to viable use.

Increased flexibility of venue will offer a range of different options and packages to cater to different couples' tastes and budgets, whilst allowing venues to expand and diversify their offer. For larger venues, this would mean being able to host multiple indoor and outdoor weddings concurrently, whilst for smaller venues with limited indoor space, it would open up the option to host larger weddings outdoors. Some Historic Houses members only host receptions, or don't host weddings at all because of the difficulties of needing a permanent licensed structure such as a marquee – in the curtilage of listed buildings this requires planning permission, which is often refused. Inside, hosting weddings risks wear and tear of the historic fabric of the building and collections, security risks, lack of access, and fire regulation issues – all of which can currently outweigh the benefits for an historic venue of hosting weddings.

Above all, allowing outdoor weddings would help to safeguard against any future social distancing or outdoor-only event requirements. These restrictions have decimated the industry this year, which has further demonstrated the limitations of the current 'licensed structure' system. Had venues been allowed to move their events outdoors, many would have been able to adapt to Covid restrictions and proceed with open-air Covid-secure weddings.

Consultation Question 50:

No

No

No

Please expand on your answer:

This should not be prohibited. There is significant demand, particularly among older couples, for small civil ceremonies in religious buildings such as private chapels. These venues provide an intimate traditional setting which is perfect for these smaller weddings, but currently can only be used for religious ceremonies. Historic House members whose estates include these private chapels must currently choose whether or not to deconsecrate them, with both options restricting the type of weddings these special places can be used for.

Similarly, If a religious officiant is willing to carry out a ceremony in any secular setting, they should be permitted to do so. Religious couples should not be excluded from seeking out secular venues, nor from benefitting from the new freedoms to opt for open-air weddings, which are universally popular in other countries and often highly appropriate for religious ceremonies. Currently, couples who want a religious ceremony must marry off-site and then travel to their chosen reception venue, adding expense and wasting time on their wedding day. Others opt for a religious blessing after a civil ceremony, which clergy already willingly provide in secular settings. If venues were able to offer these religious ceremonies on-site, it would be both more convenient for the couple, and allow venues to expand their offer. It would also help to minimise environmental damage from wedding parties and guests travelling back and forth unnecessarily between ceremony and reception venues.

Consultation Question 51:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, provided that officiants undergo training or receive guidance to determine whether a location is safe and appropriate for a wedding. If the officiant signs off on the location, it is also important that they carry the necessary liability and insurance for any unforeseen issues or accidents at the location. This is particularly crucial in settings such as woodland, beaches or fields on a rural estate, which may involve natural hazards.

As proposed in the consultation, we support an opt-in system whereby a Local Authority would hold a list of pre-approved venues which had previously hosted weddings.

Unsure. Venues are really struggling to meet costs after this year, and are already burdened by significant fees related to planning, fire regulations, health and safety, licensing and more. A small fee may be acceptable, but a larger fee (such as the current venue licensing fee of thousands of pounds) will prevent some venues from being able to join the scheme, and possibly create a two-tier system of larger venues who are able to afford pre-approval and smaller venues which cannot.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

Allowing couples to arrange ceremonies which are better tailored to their personal beliefs and tastes will make marriage more accessible to all. It is also likely to increase the demand for domestic weddings in cases where the law would previously have encouraged couples seeking more flexible ceremonies and locations to marry abroad.

The pandemic has also created a huge backlog of couples who otherwise would have had weddings this year. This surplus has seen many venues booked up for the next two years and even beyond, so opening up the wedding venue market to allow weddings in a wider variety of settings as soon as possible will ensure that the market can respond to this surplus. Due to this increased need for weddings and especially outdoor weddings, we would urge the Law Commission to fast-track their recommendations so that the industry can begin to recoup as soon as possible after what has been an extremely difficult year for couples, venues and suppliers alike.

Marriage is a very serious matter and should not be entered into lightly. Allowing independent officiants would pave the way to those who may not take this seriously enough. It also opens the door to the possibility of independent officiants becoming big business in the future. The more you pay the more outlandish or extreme the conditions under which you might get married.

The prescribed words are important to be uttered agreed and witness in the wedding ceremony. If not you might as well apply for marriage certificate on line like a TV license or something. The prescribed words must remain to be spoken and agreed otherwise the ceremony has little significance.

Consultation Question 19:

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

In small churches [REDACTED] there is often no 'authorised person' appointed, and the local Registrar of Births, Marriages and Deaths attends and is in an adjoining room, but able to hear the couple use the 'prescribed words' and later prepare the Marriage Certificate and complete the Register. The reasons why there is no authorised person vary but mostly, it is because the church is few in numbers and the administrative burden of appointing such a person and changing them when they die or move away is too onerous for the small congregation. Continuing the current arrangements will help ensure that a couple who e.g. marry in my church because of their Christian beliefs, are enabled to have a 'meaningful' ceremony incorporating both their religion and the civil law requirements, and this seems to be one of the aims of the Law Commission. Why try to fix something which is not broken? Removing the presence of the Registrar of Marriages will mean that in such a church the couple will likely need also to attend a separate Civil registration ceremony which takes away from the meaningfulness of the 'joint' ceremony which is the current arrangement.

Consultation Question 25:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Why have a minimum limit on number of members? Surely, a church with 15 members would be as able to nominate an officiant if they want to do so as a larger body.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

This is contentious because Christians have a perception that the law is currently being interpreted in ways which in relation some social issues (whether it be, the transgender debate, LGBT rights or, and most importantly, on the question of what constitutes a marriage) seems to result in decisions which run counter to Christian and Biblical views.

When I was [REDACTED] visiting regularly the local Registrar's office [REDACTED], this conservative/Biblical view also corresponded, in the main, with the State's view of marriage, so that there was no need to worry about the interpretation of law resulting in decisions which seem to Christian believers, like me, to be wrong. I say this because I recall seeing in the local Registry office an official Notice on display which read so far as I recall "Marriage according to the law of this land is the union of one man with one woman for life to the exclusion of all others". That was also the Christian/Biblical view. However, currently, this is not the State's definition of marriage and Christians find themselves in difficulties.

Therefore, it is unwise to introduce a law which excludes bodies from nominating officiants if the body (e.g. church) espouses views which the State, through its various organs deems contrary to public policy or morality. This is because the State's views - the Court's view - on these issues of policy and morality may and now, often are, contrary to the Christian/Biblical view of what is right and good as moral.

Therefore, it would be better not to include such words in this 'test' but rather to deal with 'excluding' certain bodies on a test based more on facts than opinions about policy or morality. In other words to have a more objective, rather than subjective 'test' e.g. the body concerned 'promotes violence against women' or 'violent overthrow of the State or society' which are illegal.

It is dangerous to exclude persons on the basis of policy and morality where the views of different people, including State officials, as to what constitutes immorality or what is inimical to the public are so subjective and direr so widely.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I doubt this would be a good idea or helpful in the long-term in promoting a stable society. It is possible that 'officiants' will see their position as 'just a business' proposition. At present, in those churches which have an 'authorised person', the 'officiant' has no financial interest in carrying out those duties; gets no gain and tends to be a person of strong Christian or other religious beliefs who is likely to uphold the dignity of marriage and to resist any requests of the couple for 'outlandish' undignified rites. The Commission's proposal could lead to a 'business' which would have much less interest in the dignity of marriage; the way the ceremony is conducted, and be more inclined than an 'uncommitted/independent' officiant (authorised person) to 'allow' almost anything in the ceremony that the parties to the marriage requested.

Would such CPD simply reflect the changing mores of society or the fixed teaching of the Christian faith and of the Bible.? Probably it would not.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I would prefer that the prescribed words which must now be said during the wedding ceremony be retained and the parties' consent should be expressed in the manner which those words currently require. Why omit the words about impediment? Surely, it is a good thing to at least put the parties under some 'pressure' to reveal such things as consanguinity or bigamy.

In place of this current, easily understood requirement. the Commission propose what could turn out to be a multitude of different ways of ensuring that consent etc. is expressed and this cannot be good for marriage. One of the great reasons for traditions like the current marriage requirements is that everyone knows what they say, what they mean and that all who are married are equally all within a 'state' of marriage. What is the purpose of giving the Registrar this proposed notice? It will simply create more bureaucracy and greater uncertainty about whether the ceremony did constitute marriage. Especially is this so if the method of expressing consent is to be inferred other than from words. This uncertainty is probably the reason for the Commission's use of the words of their parts 3 and 4 of this question.

It is probable also that allowing more and more ways of expressing consent will lead to the over-personalisation of the ceremony and to it being seen as idiosyncratic and purely personal, rather than a public declaration in a form everyone understands.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I feel that this too will result in some bizarre ceremonies which, while satisfying the couple's wishes, does nothing either for the dignity of marriage nor for the concept - long part of marriage history through the ages - that marriage is a public, not a private ceremony.

This is an essential element of the public nature of marriage. Everybody has an interest in who is and who is not married. Historically this probably has much to do with the question of who is to be responsible for a couples' children. Further, a public marriage may help to stop forced marriage.

I'm not quite sure what this is aimed at. However, the idea of getting married and then not co-habiting seems to me to be the very opposite of the reason for marriage, namely stable families, either of the couple themselves, or of them plus their children. If it is to guard rules about inheritance after a marriage e.g in hospital or the sudden death of one party immediately after the ceremony then I do not have anything against that.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

I think that the current regulations do not discourage marriage and that the proposals of the Commission are unlikely to facilitate couples getting married except, perhaps, those who want to be able to have a ceremony which is purely personal and idiosyncratic e.g. marriage in the basket of a balloon.

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Although we have an "authorised person" at our church who can officiate in this capacity, this proposal would restrict those Christian churches that do not possess such a person insofar as they would not then be able to hold weddings since they would not be able to procure the services of a suitable person because the civil registrar would be restricted to officiating at a civil service only.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

The term "contrary to public policy or morality" is far too subjective an assessment. If people hold views that are entirely legal but which are not necessarily popular with some, it would prejudice their being right to nominate officials. Instead, "the test" should focus on more objective criteria. For example these criteria could include promoting purposes that are illegal, or support illegal activity; such as terrorism for example, or that advocate the violent overthrow of democracy, or that undermine the rule of law.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Currently, those who officiate at wedding ceremonies are either highly trained registrars or religious representatives who are likely to have strongly-held beliefs on marriage. Allowing independent officiants would open the door to those who may not place such a high value on marriage. Independent officiants (known as 'celebrants') can currently conduct weddings that are not legally binding. These have included ceremonies held in many undignified places. One ceremony involved a couple dressed as a pair hedgehogs! Such ceremonies utterly undermine the dignity of marriage.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The current prescribed words form a foundation for the declarations that are required for a marriage. Without these words the wedding ceremony can easily be as meaningless as the couple or the officiant chooses, and therefore legal marriage can become nothing more than a certificate from the Government. Marriage is founded on solemn promises made between two parties. Under these proposals it would be possible to have a legally recognised wedding in which no words were said between the couple, let alone promises of any kind. Marriage is supposed to be a commitment for life. Therefore, it must be taken very seriously, and without the prescribed words it is much easier to treat the ceremony casually. The prescribed words are only a small part of the entire wedding ceremony, but form an important part of what is being committed to. The rules are already extremely flexible about what happens in the rest of the ceremony. It is hard to imagine a genuine wedding in which it would not be desirable to include the prescribed words at some point. Allowing wholly personalised wedding ceremonies without any legally-required words would send the message that marriage is an entirely private matter, and cheapen marriage.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is far more important that a legal wedding ceremony reflects the seriousness of the commitment the parties are making than that it is personalised to the couple. A non-legally binding ceremony can already be as personalised as people want. These have included ceremonies held in many unsuitable and undignified places. Such personalisation will damage the sanctity and value of marriage.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The 'open doors' requirement fulfils a valuable part of wedding day celebrations. It makes it clear that marriage is not a private affair, but rather is important to society as a whole as an essential building block of society. Equally, it might be said the opposite is also important; weddings which are not publicly accessible tend to make a statement that said marriage is private and of interest only to the couple themselves. This couldn't be further from the truth. Ensuring that weddings are open to any member of the public, rather than just those invited, is a way of protecting against forced marriage or bigamy, for example.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

It could be a matter of serious concern that it is unclear in these proposals as to what safeguards will be in place to prevent unsuitable venues being used. How then will the essential dignity of such ceremonies be guaranteed? Whilst the consultation does state that any venue would need to be 'dignified' and 'safe', this lacks precision on what this means or how it will be tested. Any venue used must not detract from the solemn occasion of the wedding itself. The Law Commission has made it clear it sees no objection to weddings "in the air", suggesting that the terms 'dignified' and 'safe' could be interpreted very broadly. Unofficial weddings have been conducted underwater, in a sadomasochism dungeon, at a comic book convention with a couple dressed as fictional characters, and at a ruined leper hospital on Halloween. Such settings quite clearly trivialise marriage, and the law must not allow such venues to host legally binding ceremonies. The solemnity, value and importance of marriage should not be trivialised in this way.

Consultation Question 2:

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

I have conducted and registered weddings during the pandemic. I feel that weddings in the register office that we have full control over all went safely and according to the government guidelines. However weddings in external places such as hotels I did not feel very safe at as the staff did not always ensure that all the guidelines were followed. When the majority of the guests are not wearing masks it places the registrar in a very difficult position of not feeling safe or potentially alienating the guests and the couple by asking for them to be put on.

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes as we need to ensure that there is a UK address for them should any further contact be needed

Consultation Question 5:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Absolutely, this would be so much easier for all concerned if the preliminaries could already be available to the registrar when the informant's attend the register office. It is needed for them to attend though so that identify checks and the right to be married in the UK can be confirmed.

Consultation Question 6:

seven days; or

Please expand on your answer:

I believe it should be seven days to allow for any potential issues to be resolved before the wedding day, three days is too short a space of time especially if a weekend and bank holiday are involved which could push over the three days.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

I agreed with this, but only if there are certain and very thorough checks made to ensure nationality, identity and the right to marry. Given the current pandemic it would be safer health wise for all concerned if this could be remotely. Without these checks though, then no I think it should be in person.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

Absolutely, all these conditions at the moment are well covered and I see no reason to deviate from them. We want to ensure that our commonwealth areas and armed forces are able to give notice.

Consultation Question 9:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes as it may be impossible for people to travel to see them displayed at the register office, although I think they should be displayed online and in the register office as we have to consider that some people do not have internet access.

Consultation Question 10:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As notices are valid for 12 months now I do not see any reason to change this if we move over to schedules.

Consultation Question 11:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Absolutely, we need to ensure that the officiant is identified and that checks can then be made to ensure they are entitled to officiate at a ceremony. Any amendments should be officially done to ensure that details are correct and up to date should any further checks be needed then or in the future.

Consultation Question 12:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I agree that somebody should be able to step in to cover, as this would happen now if the vicar or registrar was not available. However there do need to be some rules or checks put in place to ensure that this is still a legal and valid officiant, to ensure the marriage is also legal and valid.

Please share your views below:

I can't think of any other reason that a substitute should be used, but would be willing to consider any other circumstances.

Consultation Question 13:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As these countries have their own national and accepted churches for their countries I agree with this. We should not allow other countries that we can not easily regulate to do this work on our behalf. If people wish to be married in an Anglican wedding in England they should have to publish banns in England.

Consultation Question 14:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Given that war damage these days would be on a far greater extent than back in the times of the first and second world wars, whereby whole regions could be damaged, I agree that this should be repealed. Our services will have a lot more to deal with than somebody wishing to get married in an Anglican church.

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

As we are considering online publication for notices I believe that we should consider online publication for banns also. People may not have the ability to travel to the local church to check the banns. It may also be considered if they are published in a register office.

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

Absolutely, as these are minimum requirements at the moment for civil weddings they should be for Anglican ones. There are important reasons why these checks must be mandatory.

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

Absolutely, we must consider that either person is open to be put under duress to form a marriage and may find it impossible to convey this if their partner was present at the interview.

Consultation Question 18:

all weddings should be preceded by civil preliminaries.

Please expand on your answer:

It would streamline the system to ensure that all details are kept by one authority and there is no confusion over which system to use.

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes we have to ensure that the legality of marriage is maintained.

Consultation Question 20:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Registration Officers should not be asked to officiate at religious weddings as that may not be their religion or they disagree with the religion. They should not be put in the position that they have say religious words that they disagree with.

Consultation Question 21:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No for safety reasons I do not agree to only one registrar attending. Where the wedding is to be held in premises such as a hotel, as long as they have staff present to run the wedding then I would consider that one registrar may be enough. However after officiated at many weddings I do not believe that all staff and areas where there are not to be staff such as peoples private gardens, it is not suitable from a safety point of view to there by yourself. You have no back up and should things not go well you have nobody to turn to for assistance.

Consultation Question 22:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As long as they are regulated and trained to perform this role I see no issue with it.

Consultation Question 23:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Absolutely fine that they regulate their own officiants as long as they can confirm that all legalities and training have been undertaken and that they keep the register updated and available to be checked by registrars.

Consultation Question 24:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes it should be defined and set up as a legal entity.

Please share your views below:

Yes there should be organisations that are non religious and still able to have officiants.

Consultation Question 25:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I agree that the belief in marriage should be held but not necessarily that at least 20 members are needed.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Absolutely, it has to be lawful and moral.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

Yes I agree, as a registrar I am nominated by office

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes as this then means that it is maintained appropriately.

Consultation Question 29:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes that way it is controlled by the GRO.

Consultation Question 30:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes but with the proviso that they meet the minimum set requirements as defined by law or regulations.

Consultation Question 31:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes to ensure that it is all regulated correctly.

Consultation Question 32:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If this is the living they choose then they should be paid in order for them live a reasonable standard of living.

Consultation Question 33:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I agree to them setting their own fees.

Consultation Question 34:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I agree as this could prove a conflict of interest.

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Absolutely, if you don't believe in it yourself you should not be allowed to officiate.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Absolutely as this means they are the one regulating body.

Consultation Question 37:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes but GRO should also have this responsibility

Consultation Question 38:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

yes and also they should be able to take action against the body if they have failed in their duty of care.

Consultation Question 39:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As the regulating body they should have this right.

Consultation Question 40:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No, there needs to be rules in place in order that the process is kept legal.

Consultation Question 41:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree, and they would then have to reapply.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes in order to make it lawful

Consultation Question 43:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes as long as it is lawful and abides to any regulations

Consultation Question 44:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes it should remain with the religious group to police.

Consultation Question 45:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No as it may go against beliefs of one of the parties.

Please share your views below:

No I think civil weddings should be kept non religious

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No as I believe a civil ceremony should be non religious.

Consultation Question 47:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes as people can object before the ceremony takes place.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There needs to be some control over where a wedding can be held outdoors,, on inland waters such as lakes or rivers,

Please share your views below:

I believe they could be held outdoors and also on inland waters, but in the air or in a private home may cause issues.

Consultation Question 49:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The public has time to object before the wedding takes place so should not need access to the wedding itself,

Consultation Question 50:

Yes

Yes

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Religious and civil weddings should be kept separate, however I believe that blessings could take place at a civil wedding if wished by the couple marrying.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There needs to be control over where a wedding can be held not just the view of the officiant

Consultation Question 52:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As long as that is written into a contract or such like that the officiant is held responsible to.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This would provide the same rules for all I agree.

Consultation Question 53:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Please share your views below:

GRO and the officiant should be responsible

Please expand on your answer:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I agree on the mistakes but witnesses and signing are a must

Consultation Question 58:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 59:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

In general I disagree as they should be together, but there may be circumstances where they may not

No

Please expand on your answer:

just because you live together does not mean you are legally a couple I completely disagree with this and it goes against the reason for being married and therefore legitimising and legalising your relationship

Consultation Question 60:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 61:

Yes

Chapter 11: Special types of wedding

Consultation Question 62:

Please share your views below:

I believe these rules are working at the moment and I don't see any reason to alter them

Consultation Question 63:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

yes as we need to ensure the same level of checking as for any marriage

Consultation Question 64:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

yes as long as checks are in place

Consultation Question 65:

No

Please expand on your answer:

no if they are wanting to get married because they are terminally ill it should be held promptly, otherwise they should follow the full process of notices or banns

Consultation Question 66:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If they want the validity period to be this long they should follow the notice or banns process

Consultation Question 67:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

I don't see that the current law discourages people from getting married, if you are committed to your relationship then you should ensure that it is legal. I think the provisional proposals will lead to more people getting married, but i'm not sure that will be for legal purposes

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

I think as the costs would be know up front it is entirely up to the couple wanting to get married as to how much they want to pay, the variety ensures there are options for all.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

I think register office weddings are a must and should be made available to all. I don't believe in a preapproval process. A legal wedding if you wish to be married is a must.,

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The way a wedding is conducted has an effect, not only on the couple themselves, but also on all the others who are present, or hear/see or become aware of it later, eg if it is taken (by all involved) with a due seriousness and awareness of the meaning and lifelong significance of marriage, this will affect every body's view of that marriage, and (to some extent) of all marriages.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

It needs to be stressed that this is a serious occasion (as well, of course, as a happy one!), and that though some degree of merriment may enter in later, it is about a lifelong (and therefore life changing) commitment.

Please expand on your answer:

Allowing "public access" goes along with the fact that this wedding (as every other wedding) is of concern to the whole community (which is presumably why we have laws about it), and not merely a private affair.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There needs to be due regard to what I've already tried to say - this occasion needs to be recognised as a lifelong, serious, vitally important matter, and people are affected (some more, some less) by the place in which something happens - there is a fitness about some places that other places lack. eg a funeral service would "feel" all wrong in a circus ring!

Please share your views below:

No to all of them, on the grounds I stated above.

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The residential requirement provides a safety net preventing hurried and possibly illegal marriages taking place e.g. a minor giving a false age or an illegal immigrant who may be married already with a spouse in another country. Notice enables the authorities to make any necessary checks.

Consultation Question 5:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

For the reasons stated above.

Consultation Question 6:

another period of time.

Please expand on your answer:

A longer period is desirable in order that any necessary checks on the information given by the two parties may be carried out.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

All interviews should be in person so that body language and attitudes can be ascertained clearly.

Consultation Question 8:

Yes,

Consultation Question 9:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

They should also be published as in the present forms in order to prevent clandestine and illegal marriages. Publishing on line may not cover all contingencies of reaching to the public - this is a concern as a marriage is a matter of public situation and not just a private arrangement.

Consultation Question 10:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 11:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

It is important that the officiant or the substitute be a properly authorised person for the purpose ,in order to preserve the seriousness and the dignity of the ceremony.

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

They should be published in the building where the marriage is to take place as it is an act of information to the local community of an intending change in the situation of two people within the community

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

This is most important. Unfortunately, people in these days cannot generally be relied upon to give truthful answers if it is not convenient to them. Evidence is necessary as the days when it would have been considered inconceivable to lie to a priest have long gone. Face to face meetings are necessary, not only to provide signs of suspicious behaviour but also for the priest to share the seriousness of the marriage commitment with the couple concerned.

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

Unfortunately, now that forced marriages are a possibility again these days a separate declaration would be advisable.

Consultation Question 18:

Anglican preliminaries should continue to be recognised as legal preliminaries to weddings officiated by the Church of England and the Church in Wales; or

Please expand on your answer:

Subject to the above provisos, this should continue.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There is a danger of some parties taking a frivolous view. Marriage should always be seen as a serious commitment . It is not just a private matter for the couple concerned but a matter for society as a whole.

Consultation Question 44:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 45:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This would be confusing to the couple and to people present. It would seem to be illogical not to have a religious ceremony if one wanted a civil ceremony with some religious content. It must be one or the other.

Please share your views below:

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There may be instances where a couple wish to have a civil ceremony but would wish to have that marriage blessed and prayed for publicly.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Open doors is a provision to prevent secretive and possibly illegal marriages taking place.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The serious nature of marriage must be upheld. Marriage in the monkey house of a zoo could not be seen to do that.

Please share your views below:

In view of the above answer it is obvious that marriages should take place in authorised places as at present. Marriage in a hang glider is not conducive to dignity or a serious commitment to the marriage.

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 55:

No

Please expand on your answer:

English is the common language of the United Kingdom. If local languages are used then there must be an additional English version. If Welsh only were to be accepted then it will not be long before there will be demands for the Gaelic, Erse, and Cornish languages to be used.

Consultation Question 56:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Chapter 10: Validity and offences

Consultation Question 57:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This would render the ceremony to be open to fraud. Witness must be present and the necessary documents must be properly signed for authentication.

Consultation Question 58:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 59:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If the partners are not to cohabit this makes it possible for marriages of convenience to take place e.g. whereby one party can gain citizenship by virtue of the marriage. Clearly, the requirement of cohabitation must be waived in certain cases e.g. where one party is immediately called up for military service in an emergency.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage itself, whether religious or civil, is a stabilising factor in society and it is a proven aid to the stability of the nurturing of any issue.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

The law does not discourage or prevent couples from getting married if they are serious in their intent.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

The cost of marrying in registered places of worship are not prohibitive. It is the added extras that make a marriage so expensive. It depends whether the couple want a 'show' or a life-time commitment.

My husband and I were married in a Methodist Church on a Sunday morning immediately before the Morning Service, with the Congregation as our witnesses, popped across the road for a meal with family in a local restaurant and invited everyone round to our [together/new] home for the evening for a party. Inexpensive, homely, friendly, before God and lasting until his death.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

It is not the location, it's the commitment that is the issue.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Yes, so long as the definition of morality is not changed to include things that are in fact immoral. This raises the question of the source of this moral standard, and the traditional answer in Western civilization has been the Bible.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

Naming the person may be safer. Internal changes in an organisation may mean people who are quite inappropriate finding themselves able to officiate at marriages, something the organisation may not have intended.

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The organisation would use its own judgement, but government guidelines would be issued to them, I assume.

Consultation Question 31:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, so long as the 'mandatory training' does not go against the churches teaching on marriage based on the Bible.

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Guidance should be given about what constitutes 'dignity and solemnity'. Otherwise, those engaging in skydiving, in Disney themed parties or beer festivals may feel they are fulfilling this condition. This could seriously undermine the character and seriousness of the marriage contract. It would have grave repercussions in society if marriage was approached in the same way people approach Donald Duck!

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

How else would we know?

Consultation Question 37:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This does not stop the General Register Office acting if necessary.

Consultation Question 38:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, unless the General Register Office adopts a definition of marriage that is against the traditional teaching of the church as defined in the Bible. They might otherwise de-authorise inappropriately.

Consultation Question 39:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, as long as the test of a 'fit and proper person' does not exclude those who uphold the traditional view of marriage as defined in the Bible.

Consultation Question 40:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Why would there be?

Consultation Question 41:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, as long as 'continuing professional development' does not include an insistence that the traditional teaching of marriage as defined in the Bible be altered.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

1. Not to express publicly that there are no impediments to marriage may tend to reduce the importance of those impediments in the eyes of those being married, those attending the ceremony and to society generally.
2. This may encourage forms of consent not consistent with the solemn marriage vows undertaken.
3. The consent should be expressed solemnly and personally in the wedding ceremony to underline the seriousness of the event.
4. The marriage contract should be legally binding from the moment the declaratory and contracting words have been publicly uttered at the wedding ceremony to emphasize its gravity and life-changing nature.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The forms chosen may be altogether out of character with the serious, life-long commitment on which the prosperity and happiness of the couple marrying and their family may largely depend.

Public access to a marriage ceremony is vital in order to allow public scrutiny of the event. This is especially relevant now with the prevalence of forced marriages.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A ceremony taking place in the local 'watering hole' might be hard put to not imbibe the atmosphere of its surroundings. The seriousness of marriage could be severely compromised.

Consultation Question 23:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Provided that English law (not Sharia) governs the code and form of words describing the contract

Consultation Question 24:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Secular "belief" is simply religion in which man is God

Please share your views below:

An organization which does not acknowledge that its beliefs are equivalent to "religion" is self deluded and incorrectly described

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

I doubt that the current law discourages marriage. It may discourage marriages which are sham, coerced, or flippantly entered into.

The proposals seem to be designed to mask the removal of the serious nature of a life-long commitment through the use of vague terms which could be manipulated in law

There should still be core words for the two to say to each other in person and in public at the wedding ceremony which should themselves be a way of expressing the dignity and solemnity of the occasion. There is ample scope for additional and personalised statements or celebrations.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

See answer to Q42: there should be a recognised and consistent core, with scope to add to it if the couple wish. A marriage is a societal act with wider consequences than for just the couple, not just a private deal between two individuals.

Consultation Question 44:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 45:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This is an unclear proposal. If "remains identifiable as a civil ceremony" means that the religious element has to be treated as no more than myth or sentiment then the religious element is not being treated seriously. If it means participants will say things they do not believe that is hypocrisy and devalues the promises being made.

Please share your views below:

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

In a culture with many religious positions some couples want to confirm their vows in a religious ceremony even if, for various reasons, they have the legal ceremony in a civil context. Their religious freedom to do so should be respected.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Our son's planned wedding could not go ahead, but their priority was for the marriage to take place. The legal requirements were conducted with 10 people in a registry office and a religious ceremony was conducted by a pastor later the same day. A celebration with the intended number of guests will take place when possible.

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

For many couples the religious ceremony is the essence of the wedding. Not all churches have their own qualified registrar and this would impose a two-part ceremony (to the detriment of both services). This is what happened to my son and his (now) wife as a result of Covid restrictions. It was tolerable in an emergency but should not become the norm.

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I don't agree because some churches do not have an authorised person to officiate and this change would make them unable to hold weddings. Also it seems to make an unnecessary division between the role of church and state. I do not think that widening this divide would be helpful for churches.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

While this appears a reasonable suggestion I do not agree with it. I would be concerned about the unintended consequences of such a policy. For example the wording "contrary to public policy" is not very specific. It could result in organisations like churches falling foul of this law if they were deemed to fall under this category. I would propose a more objective test like actually breaking the law.

I feel that allowing independent officiates to apply and be registered risks undermining the status of marriage. It is better that this role be limited to religious ministers or trained registrars rather than opening this role to those who may potentially hold very different views of marriage than have traditionally and historically been held.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I feel that changing the wording of the marriage ceremony and not specifying the way in which consent to be married is to be given Would have the effect of undermining the seriousness of the marriage ceremony. Without using the current prescribed wording of responses it is easy to see how the act of marriage could be reduced to something very trivial depending on the individual's choices of wording. Such changes will not serve to maintain the significance of marriage in our culture and would see that as a very retrograde step

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I disagree because such a personalised approach will tend to result in ceremonies which will not reflect the seriousness of the decision and the commitment being made. While it would appear good to have a choice and to personalise one's ceremony, withdrawing any requirements for the nature of the ceremony will tend to result in ceremonies which devalue marriage.

It is important that weddings should be seen to open and transparent and for it be made obvious that couples are marrying before their community. This reinforces the message that marriage is not secret but a statement that is made publicly. Such a practice also protects against bigamy and forced marriage.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I feel that there is a danger in allowing weddings to take place in any place as the wording of dignified and safe lacks precision and is not specific enough. There is again a danger that the sanctity and dignity of the wedding service if there is not more guidance than stated in the proposed statement.

Ensuring that weddings are open to any member of the public, rather than just those invited, is a way of protecting against forced marriage and bigamy.

The 'open doors' requirement is a valuable part of wedding day celebrations, making it clear that marriage is not a private affair, but rather is important to society as a whole

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

There are clear advantages to changing the system. Many churches that do not own their own premises but worship in shared buildings like community centres or schools cannot currently hold weddings in those venues. But the danger is that removing the restrictions opens the door to inappropriate venues being used.

There is a serious concern that it is unclear what safeguards will prevent unsuitable venues being used. How will the dignity of such ceremonies be guaranteed?

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The answer is that to question 47 - marriage is not a matter of privacy but is a declaration to society and there should be no unreasonable restrictions on access. Also objections - say to bigamy - should be allowed to be aired safely in a semi-public venue.

For these reasons - the main legal wedding ceremony must be in a building registered for the purpose.

Chapter 1: Introduction

Consultation Question 1:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I have been involved in a discussion with members of the public regarding a "marriage" they attended in which both they and the couple thought they were attending a legal marriage ceremony and it was not until the marriage broke down that they became aware that the marriage was not legal. The celebrant involved did not make anything clear during the process or ceremony that it was not a legal contract and the couple did not make additional enquiries beyond what the celebrant had said.

I have also had conversations with a person who had travelled with her husband to a venue, within E&W, to attend an outside marriage ceremony in a woodland area without a structure, which they had been led to believe was a legal civil ceremony, neither the couple nor the celebrant made it clear to those assembled that it was a celebration and not a legal marriage.

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

As a registration officer responsible for co-ordinating ceremony bookings, the whole process has been stressful and often confusing for both the service and couples. The guidance we received was often contradictory which made it even harder for staff to cope with the process of rearranging hundreds of ceremonies. A delay between what the media report and our official information can often be misinterpreted. We have had to deal with many different concerns and we had to totally change our office procedures to deal with the volume. The couple who have decided to stay with getting married during these challenging times have in the main been wonderful and appreciated the time and effort we put into making their day work even if it was not what they had first anticipated their day would look like. Speaking as a registrar the local authority venues and approved venues have been assessed thoroughly and Covid guidelines employed in order that people have felt safe to hold their ceremonies. At the ceremonies overall people have respected and abided by the guidelines. We have dealt with a myriad of couples' issues and it became quite clear during the pandemic that what a wedding meant to one couple was totally different to another. In the early days of lockdown we spent much of our time moving weddings to alternative dates over the next two years. This has continued as lockdown and restrictions have increased. Some couples have wanted to rearrange for the earliest possible date and were willing to sacrifice the reception/party/honeymoon etc, other couples felt that without the reception and a large number of guests, they wouldn't feel their day was complete; a third set were somewhere in the middle. Since lockdown our ceremonies have been almost exclusively for couples who just wanted to get married, who are grateful to have their ceremonies despite restrictions and in some cases have said that the restrictions have helped them make decisions which were difficult before lockdown ie who to invite and who not to invite. The content of ceremonies is brief as per guidelines, however as a registrar conducting the ceremonies I have found that there is a greater chance of engaging with couples and guests and that the ceremonies themselves have become more intimate and meaningful.

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This would simplify matters for residents of E&W as they would be able to give notice anywhere within E&W. This could also simplify matters for British subjects living/working outside of the country. Foreign nationals would be another matter; we believe some sort of visa should still be required. If you are proposing a two-part notice online and then face to face, this would reduce the time needed in the country.

Consultation Question 5:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This could be open to abuse but having face to face appointments at a later stage could / would hopefully negate that, but a robust system to assure that the person filling in the online form is actually the person presenting will need to exist. This two-part procedure may start the waiting period but if they still have to attend with documents to prove correct information, we argue it would be no quicker for couples. Identify fraud, mental capacity, sham and forced marriage all need to be taken into account.

Consultation Question 6:

seven days; or

Please expand on your answer:

The extension of the 15 day waiting period to 28 / 70 day waiting period was due to immigration concerns. Those will surely have to be addressed before any further reduction is made. If the proposal is to start the waiting period (whatever that might be) online then the "in-person" interview should be around 7 days before the earliest date they can marry in order to give time to come back again if something is wrong.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

A movement to remote interview will again need to be very robust in order that the interviewer is confident that the interviewee is who they say they are and that they are not under any type of duress. Coercion within the situation for sham marriages or capacity to marry can often only be gauged by face to face meetings. If the interview was remote a registrar may not be able to determine any of this. It should not be up to a registrar to say "there is a problem, you will need to come in in person". It should be one or the other for clarity for all.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

If the notices go online this should not be a problem if followed up by a rigorous personal interview.

Consultation Question 9:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree that we need a more widespread medium for the notices to be displayed but wherever that is it must be advertised and available to all. We will also need a robust system for being notified should problems/objections occur and those submitting an objection should know the seriousness of doing so.

Consultation Question 10:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This would make sense.

Consultation Question 11:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It would be far better to name the venue as we do now and then there would be no need to issue further paperwork for a change of officiant. This would save resources.

Consultation Question 12:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, if it was the venue/location and officiant for the area would be able to attend.

Please share your views below:

No but we struggle to see what that might be.

Consultation Question 13:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, universal civil preliminaries would be the same process for everyone.

Consultation Question 14:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Banns should be published in the same way as for civil notices, through a more widespread public system.

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

If we are looking at simplifying the processes then this should be the same publication as notices for civil marriages and to make it similar still through universal civil preliminaries.

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As registration officers the service has provided this for almost 200 years. There have been changes over time and the registration service has always shown a resilience and ability to adapt in order to deliver a service which is seen as part of a national measure. Training and accountability are key.

Consultation Question 20:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree, we see no reason for registration officers to be involved in a religious setting if your proposals go through and the clergy will no longer need to complete a marriage entry. Though we do wonder how the definition of civil and religious weddings will be delineated if all officiants can lead ceremonies which have religious content as requested by couples if/when that choice is open to them.

Consultation Question 21:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Currently one person deals with the legal paperwork (officiant) and the other conducts the ceremony. If it changes to one person this will open up our ability to attend more ceremonies at popular times but it may also result in staff raising health and safety and wellbeing concerns ie lone working.

Consultation Question 22:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Only if the one required to attend has appropriate training and continues with professional development as registrars do now. If the registration service are required to train the clergy (as previously suggested with the schedule system) the service should receive appropriate recompense.

Consultation Question 23:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree, but there will need to be a strong process for selecting/training/governing.

Consultation Question 24:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, as long as this is not abused.

Please share your views below:

Yes, there needs to be a criteria for a non-religious belief organisation to preclude abuse of the system - any group not meeting the criteria should be excluded.

Consultation Question 25:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Keeping in line with current religious buildings/organisations would make sense as a minimum requirement.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

This would underline the importance of the marriage state and enabling them could lead to abuse of the system.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

Nomination by office does not necessarily mean they are suitable officiants therefore by named individual who is clearly trained and assessed would seem to be more relevant.

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The General Register Office is geared up for this sort of public record/list so it would make sense, but a similar format to the GMC website would work well also with an obligation for the organisation to submit regular lists of their officiants.

Consultation Question 29:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

We would prefer this did not happen as we are aware of issues of quality and reliability of independent celebrants. Having an official list on the GRO website gives a "go to" place for the public to see who they can confidently hire, however we strongly feel that the registrars offer an excellent, trusted and valued service and would wish to continue. If the schedule system requires one person attending then registrars will have additional trained staff available for marriages. An independent celebrant list for the public to access may be the way forward so that confusion is limited.

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree, registrars already in post have to be regularly accessed and monitored and it would not be fair for any other organisation/individual not to have to do the same. Quality standards for customers and approved venues are essential.

Consultation Question 31:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

If this happens the General Register Office or some other body will need to make sure that regular checks, training and monitoring are done and that there is a robust system for the public to feedback on.

Consultation Question 32:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes they should be officiating as part of the organisation and it should be on a remuneration agreed by the organisation, not by the individual.

Consultation Question 33:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

They should be prohibited from acting with a conflict of interest but it would be hard to prohibit them from charging what they want but having a publicised list of product and pricing as we do as a service would give the public a yardstick to gauge by.

Consultation Question 34:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

There should be no conflict of interest, which is the same when registrars are employed.

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, this is a major part of the responsibility of the person conducting the ceremony and should remain so, with the public's ability to complain, comment or compliment the service received.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, this is what registrars have now and it has to be the same for everyone so that bias does not occur.

Consultation Question 37:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

If they are independent it would be hoped that it would fall to the General Register Office and if attached to an organisation then that organisation should share that responsibility, but they should also be accountable to a body.

Consultation Question 38:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes the General Register Office should oversee the nominated officiants and have to final say.

Consultation Question 39:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree, this would leave one body responsible for any official lists and the General Register Office would then be in a fit position to de-authorise if deemed necessary.

Consultation Question 40:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As long as they meet the required standard, there should be no timescale but if they wish to leave/retire/stop delivering then their governing body should be informed - GRO official lists etc. Passing on of any registration to another person should not be permissible.

Consultation Question 41:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes and regular inspections would highlight such irregularities.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This would bring marriage in line with civil partnerships but the witness and the officiant need to be clear at what point consent is given as there is a need for consent to be specific and irrefutable during the actual ceremony and not before, in order that a change of mind is undisputable.

Consultation Question 43:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

There should be an agreement between the couple and the officiant, however we recommend that a timescale/point that no further changes can be made should be established. Who has the final say if the couple's choice is something which the officiant does not think seemly or appropriate as this can often be down to personal choice or interpretation.

Consultation Question 44:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, but how does this fit with the simplicity lobby?

Consultation Question 45:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

How will the distinction be made? At the moment it is quite clear that no religious content is included in a civil marriage - it is one or the other.

Please share your views below:

This could help couples who are torn between civil and religious ceremonies. However, whose role/responsibility is it - should it be to specify that it is or is not acceptable?

Consultation Question 46:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This happens already in a lot of cases whether on the same site or different. If there is a definite break between the two and it is clear that the couple are married at the end of the civil and not the religious then it should not be a problem. The point which is troubling is when couples try and deceive guests by trying to pass off a religious blessing as the legal marriage ceremony.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The facility to object must be available along with a clear and accessible alternative option available. The ability to object is also an important part of the marriage process but can only be made if the relevant information is accessible to the public.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

In theory this opens up a number of options which have never been available in E&W before but we must not lose sight of the legalities and dignity of the occasion and the fall-back position should weather be inclement. Would an indoor location be included on the schedule or does it not matter as long as the officiant agrees? Who will be responsible for the health and safety of everyone attending and moving from one place to another. Is the LA best placed to look at this beforehand?

Please share your views below:

Outdoors - A consideration to noise, weather, accessibility and health and safety must be made.

Inland waters - If the vessel was moored at a dockside it would not be a problem, if it was in the middle of the lake how would the officiant leave? Again who controls health and safety?

In the air - Consideration of health and safety for the officiant and guests would need to be considered.

In private homes - We believe a strict capacity rule would need to apply. The home owner at a cost to themselves should be able to apply for a day or temporary licence for the premises to be used, allowing for some health and safety checks/criteria to be governed by the LA.

Consultation Question 49:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

If an opportunity to object still applies then public accessibility needs to be in place.

Consultation Question 50:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

(1) A clear distinction is needed unless there has been some historical connection in the past.

(2) Keep as separate as possible unless they share a building.

(3) As above.

Consultation Question 51:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

If the officiant is a Local Authority employee they may have a criteria that they need to work to. If they are not, who would govern the officiant's responsibility for minimum standards and to be mindful of things which can go wrong? Establishing agreed minimum quality standards is critical.

Consultation Question 52:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Ahead of a ceremony this decision should be reached by a local registration officer; on the day the officiant should be able to insist amendments are made or refuse to officiate, should anything become apparent that would prevent proceedings from being safe and/or dignified.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

It would be easy for the General Register Office to set guidelines on the dignified locations but a hard task to put together guidelines that cover every type of outside and inside venue around E&W for health and safety purposes. Local authorities would be better placed overseeing the implementation of local guidelines.

Consultation Question 53:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

The process should be mandatory again for regulatory purposes.

Please share your views below:

Local authority/local registration service as it works so well already should be responsible.

Similar to the existing process with the LA but with some improvement, such as online application for a fee by client who agree to a set criteria with the knowledge of penalties if they deviate from agreement.

Chapter 8: Registration

Consultation Question 54:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

- (1) this happens already
- (2) this should be done at the publication of the schedule to avoid mistakes and abuse of the system.
- (3) not after the ceremony but at any pre-ceremony interview numbers 1 and 3 could be altered and initialled but number 2 needs to be on the schedule before the ceremony.

Consultation Question 55:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree the option should remain as it does at the moment to have the choice.

Consultation Question 56:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

As the registration service already have this with RON and have been producing historical data for almost 200 years in one form or another, we would query why another electronic system would be required, unless it is to replace RON fully? Experience when checking church registers shows that clergy are not as assiduous in preparation of their registers. We have concerns that celebrants would not maintain the standards Registrars provide now. It should be remembered that registration is also the preparation of historical documents.

Chapter 10: Validity and offences

Consultation Question 57:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree, that any one of the above would tender the marriage void.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

- (1) agree if the mistake is minor.
- (2) no - witnesses are a vital part of the ceremony - they are signing to say the proceedings for the consent have been carried out correctly - a marriage should not take place without the witnesses.
- (3) disagree.

Chapter 11: Special types of wedding

Consultation Question 62:

Please share your views below:

All current processes are tried and tested and work efficiently.

Consultation Question 63:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree, one party only as at present give notice but both interviewed prior to the ceremony.

Consultation Question 64:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

The same preliminaries and criteria without the Registrar General's involvement would be even quicker but would still need an authority's (SR) approval to produce the schedule for marriage in order to pass the waiting period.

Consultation Question 65:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Terminally ill people go through the normal process because they are aware they have 6-12 months left and they are able and want to do things in the normal way. It is only those who have a short time - days/hours left to go the RGL route so it does not need to be 12 months validity. Sadly the ill person has often died before the marriage is registered onto RON.

Consultation Question 66:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

It would depend on if location was part of the schedule and if it was, could it be amended if this was the case, 6 months would work better and would make for easier organisation of dates to attend the prison or another if they had moved. Hospital and housebound could be 12 months.

Consultation Question 67:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

(1) Totally agree would save money all round and reduce the stress levels.

(2) Disagree, it could lead to more sham and forced marriages.

(3) Disagree - our experience is that couples want their day, with family and friends. It also leaves open the possibility of forced marriages to increase. It could be difficult to maintain dignity and solemnity - and again identifying sham and forced marriages would be a problem.

(4) Disagree - this would create unnecessary complications.

Consultation Question 74:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

There should be a time limit because what is "reasonably possible"? Even if it is a month, it should be made clear to the couple there is no certificate without the schedules return. Who will be responsible for keeping track of marriages that take place?

Chapter 12: Fees

Consultation Question 75:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree but this must be a sensible amount possibly calculated by mileage as well as time for notices and marriage appointments. Our experience is that a nationally set cost recovery fee does not always cover all eventualities or deliver services in a large rural authority.

Consultation Question 76:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

(1) A realistic fee set with a proviso for the superintendent registrar to reduce the fee in cases of hardship. Quite often the purpose of these marriages is for assets to be kept between them and there is no hardship.

(2) No - terminal illness is not subject to financial circumstances with proviso for the superintendent registrar to reduce the fee in cases of hardship.

Consultation Question 77:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree it should be a national fee and this option needs to be available for low income families and couples who just want to marry with no fuss.

Consultation Question 78:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree that the local authority should set the fee on a cost recovery basis.

Consultation Question 79:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree as it is now.

Consultation Question 80:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Disagree an hourly rate of attending the marriage would not take into account all the backroom time spent on the phone/emails with the couple. The investment of the individual officer in their attire, the travel expenses, the additional often weekend extended work hours. The services investment in electronic, online systems to give the couples more freedom to manage their ceremony, the putting together of what will be an individual ceremony for each couple will be time consuming and therefore costly. All of these are things and more need to be considered when setting fees and this is what we do within our LA and still remain competitive.

Consultation Question 81:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes but we believe that if couples have greater flexibility in choosing what they want within their ceremony less people will feel the need to have additional discretionary service or an enhanced ceremony. The actual ceremony fee is a very small part of the overall cost of the wedding. The cost of the ceremony has little impact on the higher cost decisions couples make when designing their wedding.

Consultation Question 82:

Please expand on your answer:

No comment

Consultation Question 83:

Not Answered

Please expand on your answer:

(1) This is contentious to all other than the couple involved in our experience. The couples are surprised at the current fee of £15 (below cost recovery) and expect it to cost more.

(2) Disagree, it should stay as it is - this is a premium service, time-wise, at more of a cost to the LA as they pick up the cost for time and travel. Couples often expect to pay more.

Consultation Question 84:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Agree there should be a registration fee of some kind which reflects the responsibility of the position. We also think that there should be a yearly assurance report to the General Register Office for these individuals to make which reflects the importance of the job they are doing.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

(1) Absolutely not, with 26 years' experience we have not come across a couple who were unable to marry. There are some who do not have the correct documentation and can feel frustrated to supply those documents.

(2) No, whether people marry or not is a personal decision not dictated by options available. It is only once the decision to commit to marriage has been made that preferences as to ceremony options come into play.

Having boundaries and criteria that have to be met give value to the end result and at the end of the day it is the legal marriage which is important. Where couples get married nowadays is more the issue rather than the content or who performs it. Couples continue to look for "different" and meaningful places to them. So whilst proposals for outside ceremonies/at home/at sea/in the air may meet with expectations of couples, it is doubtful they will necessarily lead to a huge increase in the number of couples who are legally married. Nowadays couples focus on the event from waking up in the morning for the photographer to arrive to capture the whole day, to the last dance in the evening. Many couples feel it is a celebration of their union.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

(1) Register Office weddings should be a low cost option for minimum attendees. Register Office ceremonies are primarily for those who are unable to afford a big day or who wish to spend money on other elements of their wedding.

(2) This should take into account staff time, travel time and costs as well as the administration, organising, booking and generally dealing with the couple and their booking. We benchmark against our neighbouring districts in an attempt to keep costs affordable for our residents in both approved premise marriages and licensing costs in this LA and those who decide to come to our district to marry. Compared with the cost of the premises and other services the couple engage, the ceremony fee is still a reasonable cost although couples on low incomes can find it prohibitive and prefer to get married in LA ceremony rooms to allow for their budget.

(3) If the law stays as it is the fee needs to be set nationally.

(4) This should take into account the same costs incurred at approved premise ceremonies but also factor in assessments for health and safety and other purposes, which should require a pre-visit by local authority / registration staff.

(5) These should be costed at an approved premise fee and include a RO marriage fee. The couples who wish for these locations do not usually object to the separate legally recognised ceremony which is £57.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

(1) Register Office marriages already make a loss for the LA as they are at the moment. We see no added benefit to couples, except in ceremony content.

(2) There would be no savings to couples due to the fact that they would have to meet the costs of having their proposed venue approved for health and safety purposes and other factors. The point to bear in mind is that anyone officiating at a wedding should be aware of the nature and layout of the venue in advance and be cognisant of any associated risks.

(3) Separating the legal from the celebration only makes things more costly.

We do not think the costs under the new proposals will necessarily differ from costs today. Couples choose the type of ceremony they want. The proposals seek to enhance that choice. We do not think current approved premises will necessarily reduce their prices because there is no need for a pre-approved process as the more ceremonies they do, the less that cost becomes per ceremony. The chance of any of this costing the couple less is realistically low.

Consultation Question 87:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

(1) We have recently worked on figures for the past 3 years' worth of ceremonies and did a calculation using the cost of a 3 year licence fee for an approved premise and the number of premises we have. The result was £20.26 per ceremony undertaken by the approved premises over the 3 year period. We do not feel that this is exorbitant for venues. The current approval cost is the same whatever the venue. This means that smaller venues often decide not to licence for weddings as they may not have enough ceremonies to warrant the cost. Venues with high numbers of ceremonies benefit much more as the cost of licensing per ceremony is vastly reduced. It would be much fairer to have some sort of "per ceremony" basis for the cost of licensing ie by adding it to the ceremony fee.

(2) We review annually our staffing levels against the previous year and the current bookings for the coming year and recruit accordingly. We also regularly review our cost recovery in order to make sure that we are maintaining the correct level of fees taking into account the benchmarking of neighbouring districts too. In the East Riding of Yorkshire there is plenty of availability of registration officers to attend weddings.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

(1) If an approved premises licence is not needed this would be an obvious saving to a venue. However such venues may consider the current cost of such a licence worthwhile when considering the dilution of their business potential caused by the scope for couples to marry practically anywhere. The fact that venues who are licenced for marriage mean they go onto a national database and are part of LA service websites as a place licenced for marriages, this does navigate couples towards them. The registrars and the venues have a very good relationship, it is very much about trust and that has been highlighted during the present pandemic situation. When we have supported them by adding 6 months' free of charge to each venue when they renew their licence. We have also attended each venue and met with their responsible persons to talk about returning to ceremonies and helped with their Covid risk assessments. We have also kept them informed with emails throughout the time so that they know what we have been told by Government and GRO and how that relates to them and couples. None of this would apply if they were not our dedicated approved venues. This will benefit smaller venues where the cost of licensing is prohibitive.

(2) We have no problem with the capacity of registration officers for civil marriages. If the new schedule system changes to just one officer/officiant required per marriage we would have double the capacity of staff for marriages. Whilst we do not think it is necessarily a good idea, if there is only one registration officer required, this would facilitate many more officers to attend weddings at popular times of the day. We review annually our staffing levels to gauge demand.

(3) We feel that there is a risk that the registration service will become the one-stop shop for all issues, advice and support of these venues and organisations. Venues may welcome this but from a registration point of view it could lead to lack of standards unless there is sufficient monitoring of all officiants.

(4) We very much doubt that the numbers will increase by a significant amount once the newness of any change wears off. There are only so many couples who will marry each year, opening up the choice only moves them from somewhere which may have been established to somewhere new - this is a gain for one and a loss for another. If couples want to marry, they will do so regardless of the offer/choice available but changes will not increase the demand year on year as has been seen when approved premise marriages came in - couples moved from the churches to the approved premises. What we need to remember is that there are also couples who like the idea of being part of the history of marriage and the underpinning of the traditional marital state.

Managing income and expenditure for LAs in delivering the registrar service is key as to supporting the local economy, leisure and hospitality sectors so any change needs to enhance this and assist the LA to develop its offer further.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

We feel that the loss of the approved venue portfolio will be a backwards step and take away a level of contact, business continuity and support.

The impact on local authorities is that with more independent celebrants they may get reduced income from weddings. We do not feel the proposals will cause a long term rise in the number of weddings every year. The benefits to the local authority would really be if only one registration officer was used at a ceremony as they could then double availability for ceremony attendance - this could possibly increase income but with the influx of independent ceremonies realistically may not do so. The LA is a trusted brand for couples and we feel that couples may seek redress from the LA if their wedding is not well managed/delivered by an independent celebrant.

Consultation Question 89:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

(1) Couples do this already and we have recently had a report drawn up to substantiate this for our own area. We are lucky to attract a great many couples to our area but still do notices of our residents choosing to marry beyond our jurisdiction. People like to travel to an area that means something to them regardless of the cost to support that. Again the marriage ceremony cost is negligent to the cost of the celebrant. We are a very mobile population who is the main see no barrier to travelling to other jurisdictions to get married.

(2) The residency period often causes problems when added to the 28 day waiting period.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

(1) We do not see this will change the travelling already done by couples.

(2) The changes would make a lot of difference and enable couples to travel to this country for a holiday period and be able to marry in that time in an online process had started the waiting period countdown and the residency period was amended in some way.

Consultation Question 91:

Please share your views below:

(1) Many of the problems would result in a loss of income for local authorities. The worth and volume of the work we have undertaken with venues since 1996 when our first venue came on board would be lost entirely. This would go against our LA principle of "growing the economy" and supporting business. We would lose a stream of income which helps the LA provide the registration service as a whole.

(2) Businesses will lose a very supportive business partner in the LA. They will also have their business base diluted if ceremonies can take place anywhere.

(3) We feel that we will become administrators for all the religious organisations once we move over to a schedule system. This is not sustainable without financial recompense. # (4) We feel that if it is open choice then the need for independent officiants does not exist. The feeding pool will just increase and any form of regulation of the process will become very unwieldy. We cannot help but think that it will be a novelty for couples to use an independent. The registration service which had made the model of marrying other than in a RO or a registered building, works and it works amazingly well. We are respected by our venue colleagues and deliver an outstanding service to our community.

(5) There would not appear to be much scope for a reduction in costs for couples, given the necessity to ensure all venues are safe and fit for purpose. It looks as though the process for couples will get simpler, which is not altogether a bad thing. The cost, as we have said previously, is not down to the cost of the marriage ceremony, it is everything else that couples want to include in their day and we have no control over that. In the article <https://www.moneyadvice.service.org.uk/blog/how-much-does-an-average-wedding-cost> it states that official venues average cost is £4,354 - the average cost for the East Riding area to attend is £437.50 - about 10% of the venue cost, less than the average of a basic church marriage at £500.

I believe, however (and am working on an academic paper to substantiate this view) that the unsolemnized contract of marriage was not wholly abolished by the Act of 1753, contrary to assumptions made in judicial dicta and other literature, . It remains recognised by the law as 'marriage in the sight of God', though its material legal consequences were reduced in 1753 and have since been further reduced. It follows that some of what the Commission probably means by 'marriages not recognised by the law' are in fact recognised, in the sense that that the parties to them have contracted 'er verba de praesenti, do not commit fornication, and that copulation on their part with a third party is adultery. The law no longer attaches spiritual sanctions to these offences, except in the case of clerks in holy orders; but that does not mean that the unsolemnized contract has lost its objective character. (Members of the royal family who contract marriage without solemnization can still be ordered to solemnize in facie ecclesiae.)

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The enlargement of registration districts since 1836 makes this requirement now largely meaningless. It made some sense as the equivalent of the ecclesiastical preliminary of banns published in the parish of residence, but even then only if people aware of impediments were as likely to visit the register office and check its noticeboard as they were to attend Sunday worship in their parish church.

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

No. An in-person interview enables the interviewee to speak freely, whereas an online interview may be influenced by a person out of camera view. Concerns which should be investigated may thus be concealed.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

Yes.

Consultation Question 9:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consideration should also be given, in 'risk of harm' cases, to directing notice of the proposed marriage to be sent to certain people who appear to pose no such risk, but have a good chance of knowing of impediments.

Consultation Question 10:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 11:

No

Please expand on your answer:

In the case of clergy (an expression used in my responses only for clerks in holy orders) and the nominated officiants of religious (and belief) organisations, I believe it should be sufficient for the schedule to identify a category of officiant. For example, a person proposing to marry in a Welsh building shared for worship by the United Reformed Church and a Baptist church should be able to specify 'any officiant approved pursuant to statute on the nomination of the URC or of a church of the Baptist Union of Wales'. A humanist proposing to have a humanist wedding on the neach should be able to specify 'any officiant approved pursuant to statute on the nomination of Humanists UK'. For a register office wedding, 'the Superintendent Registrar or any registrar of the registration district within which the ceremony takes place' An independent officiant, however, should indeed be named as an individual in the schedule.

Consultation Question 12:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This will not be necessary if my suggestion above is followed. A couple opting for an independent celebrant must take the risk of that person being ill on the day, though the financial implications could be covered by insurance.

Consultation Question 14:

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

Banns in the parishes of residence seldom produce any objector with knowledge of impediments, and are therefore of little value.

If a party is 16 or 17, then under the present law a parent or guardian can only prevent the marriage by 'forbidding the banns' at the time of publication. If that is to remain the law, then it would make more sense for publication to be required in the parish(es) where the party's parents reside. Parents of such children would still absent themselves from Sunday worship in the parish church at their own risk; but they would have a better chance than now of preventing an unsuitable match.

I see no advantage of publication in the intended marriage venue if the parties are not parishioners.

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

I should have no objection to these proposals.

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

I should have no objection to this, and if it becomes a requirement it should apply also to special licences.

Consultation Question 18:

all weddings should be preceded by civil preliminaries.

Please expand on your answer:

I should prefer to restore the obligation on parishioners to attend their parish churches on Sundays in its pre-1689 comprehensive scope. If that were enforced, banns would remain a practical means of publicising parties' intentions.

In its absence, though, I do not see banns as achieving their original aim. Early pastoral contact can equally be achieved by requiring a longer notice period for parish church marriage and empowering the parish minister to require meetings for instruction. (Provisions appearing only in canons are generally unenforceable against the laity, so I should recommend such requirements to be made by Act or Measure.) The ecclesiastical licence procedure is merely a dispensation from the obligation of calling banns, so it would disappear if banns themselves were abolished.

Consultation Question 22:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, but since there appears to be doubt expressed in some legal literature as to the right of parishioners to marry in their parish churches (with and the concomitant obligation of the parish minister to officiate or secure an assistant curate or some other clerk to do so), I should like to see this stated clearly in statute for the avoidance of doubt.

I realise that your Terms of Reference exclude any consideration of the merits of this rule; but you are using it as a justification to treat clerks in holy orders differently from other officiants; and to my mind it is the only convincing reason to do so.

If that rule were ever to be abrogated, there would be no reason to continue the automatic recognition of clergy as officiants.

Consultation Question 23:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes; but the Commission should bear in mind that the relevant governing authority is not always a national body. In the United Reformed Church, for example, the church meeting of each local church is its governing authority when the question is registration of the church building for same sex marriage. Since the local church also determines (either in the church meeting or the elders' meeting) who should be the 'authorised person' for its building, it could also determine who officiates at marriage formation under the new proposals. In the URC, marriage is not considered a sacrament and a minister of Word and sacrament is not required to officiate at its formation. The church meeting could therefore nominate its current 'authorised person' to be an officiant. If that is not what the Commission intends, more thought may be needed here.

Consultation Question 24:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Please share your views below:

Yes - but I am happy with the examples given in the consultation. It should be possible for individual organisations to be proscribed by the Secretary of State, not so much to add to the categories as to determine conclusively that an organisation falls within one of the categories.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Yes; and see answer to question 24b.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

No. That would require public authorities - and in cases of dispute, the courts - to take cognisance of the internal polity of such bodies, which (including my own, the United Reformed Church) are in law no more than private clubs.

(The Church of England is an exception so long as it continues to be governed by the ecclesiastical common law, by Crown and Parliament, and to operate as the national religious service. If it were ever to be governed wholly autonomously, there would no longer be a reason for any such distinction from other belief groups. However, even the Church of England might welcome the certainty given by a register of names: given that the 1949 Act refers to a 'clerk in holy orders of the Church of England', and there might be borderline cases of doubt as to whom that description covers: as when a priest ordained in Barbados or Scotland receives permission to officiate in an English diocese, a deacon ordained in London receives priestly ordination in the Roman Catholic Church, or an English priest is disqualified for ten years under a disciplinary sentence).

This is another reason for against excluding the C of E from the general provision. If, for example, the Methodist Church cannot simply place all its presbyters on the register as such, but must consider each one's 'fitness and propriety' in the marriage context, why should clergy of the C of E be treated differently?

This would mean, however, that if the Vicar of a C of E parish were not found 'fit and proper', but did not have a full-time assistant curate, there would need to be a requirement (as in the Matrimonial Causes Act 1857) that he allow another clerk to officiate at marriages in the parish church, so that his ineptitude did not prejudice the rights of his parishioners.

There should be power to limit fees, exercisable by statutory instrument, but it should not initially be exercised. Consultation Question 34:

Please expand on your answer:

I think this is up to the nominating organisation. If Humanists UK trust an Orthodox priest to lead non-religious ceremonies, or the Presbyterian Church of Wales knows that one of its ministers gets a part-time income from such ceremonies, then the decision to allow such duplication should be up to them. As to 'Anglican groups', no legislation on marriage formation should affect the principle that the English public liturgy is a matter for Parliament, though generally delegated to the General Synod at present under the C of E (Worship and Doctrine) Measure 1976. Nor should it further limit (nor empower anything short of primary legislation to limit) the right of every parishioner to marry in his parish church. The Church of England is in that respect not a 'religious group'. A similar parishioners' right exists in Wales and although they are officers of a voluntary society, the ministers of the Church in Wales are bound by the concomitant obligation, in recognition of the control given to that society over Welsh public ecclesiastical assets.

As to Jewish and Quaker groups, I agree,

Consultation Question 45:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Please share your views below:

I believe the general principle set out at the start of q.45 is sufficient.

The religious content in the marriage service was always peripheral to the witnessing of the couple's consents to take one another as spouse. They do that in the sight of God whether a minister of religion is present or not. The giving of a ring by the bridegroom is not an exclusively religious symbol (and the 'exchange' of rings is mere modern tokenism).

The main element which, in the past, led high church opinion in episcopal churches to wish a priest (rather than a deacon) to officiate at marriage solemnization was the 'nuptial blessing', based on the view that only a priest can bless. Fully reformed churches tend to recognise that 'blessing' is only a prayer for God's blessing, which any believer can utter.

Readings from scripture and its exposition in teaching on the nature of marriage are also religious elements, but may well resonate with the couple's understanding. The worry expressed by Professor Watkin that a civil solemnization could become a service led by a layman does not worry me in the slightest: it is only high churchmen with an exalted view of holy orders whom this would make would seriously uncomfortable. The real test of whether the civil ceremony has become 'religious' in all but name must be the overriding impression given by the ceremony taken as a whole. The officiant will have a good overview of this and his agreement that the 'package' is acceptable should be enough.

Consultation Question 46:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I never regarded this as necessary except for the C of E, in which no service can be held without some legislative authority. Other tolerated denominations have always been able to hold whatever services they wish, so long as they don't purport to be the solemnization of marriage (in which case they must be valid solemnizations complying with the law); and a service in this context could never so purport.

Consultation Question 47:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I agree with the consultation that this has nothing to do with allowing access for potential objectors. It was a carrying-over of the open doors provision from the Toleration Act 1688, on the basis that dissenters were ipso facto unreliable and might use a closed meeting for worship for political sedition. It was not necessary to state such an obligation for the C of E since parishioners have always had access to the church in time of divine service, and to solemnize marriage in the parish church with the doors locked would always have been illegal. (I am inclined to think that, even in the dissenting context, 'open doors' must simply have meant 'unlocked doors'. It was never unlawful to close the doors to keep the heat in.)

Since the Religious Disabilities Act 1847, public dissenting worship has not required to be tolerated under the conditions of the 1688 Act. Presumably the risk of sedition under colour of religion had passed. The 1836 requirement of open doors could therefore have been repealed then.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The canonical requirement of authorised buildings began in the belief that the local Christian community would naturally congregate in the parish church, allowing both the publicity and the teaching aims of solemnization to be achieved. The 1836 requirement for dissenting meeting houses to be registered for marriages served to exclude the more dubious sects which had no buildings to register, but dubious modern sects and organisations can be excluded just as well by the conditions that must be satisfied before a group can nominate officiants.

Please share your views below:

No. Given what is said above about the open doors requirement, access for the general public is not essential. The public is represented by the witnesses and officiant, the latter having a public function and also ensuring the dignity of the occasion. I believe this could equally be done in any of the listed venues.

Consultation Question 49:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The marriage of the Cornwalls in 2005 illustrated how this requirement can have unintended consequences. But in any case, marriages have always been solemnized in Jewish homes which are not open to the public; civil solemnization should not be subject to greater regulation than Jewish.

Consultation Question 50:

No

No

Please expand on your answer:

In all cases, it is enough to leave this to the discretion of the venue owner - possibly with an exemption from the Equality Act so that the owner's policy is protected from challenge.

I notice there is no question regarding religious weddings in register offices.

Consultation Question 51:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

It may be suggested that the officiant's discretion is to be limited by his religious nominating body: generally this is acceptable. In the case of the C of E, though, this should be done by primary legislation (Act or Measure) or delegated legislation derived from such a source. It is unacceptable to impose by canon rules which will indirectly limit laypeople's choice.

Please expand on your answer:

Whether the building is 'safe' can usefully be covered by a pre-approval process. Whether it is suitable in other respects (e.g. whether a humanist officiant - if these are allowed - regards a Baptist chapel as a suitable venue) should still be for the officiant to decide.

Please share your views below:

Buildings which were parish churches, registered buildings or approved premises at the date when the changes come into force should be deemed 'pre-approved' in respect of any marriage which could have been solemnized there before the changes.

I have no strong view whether local authorities, registration authorities, the Fire & Rescue service or a central government department should pre-approve other venues in respect of safety considerations; though in all cases the officiant's discretion on suitability for a particular wedding must remain. I would also hope that any fees for pre-approval would be on a cost recovery basis.

Chapter 8: Registration

Consultation Question 54:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I think the date and location should be required to be added, not merely 'able'.

I am not clear of the reason to add parents unless it is for genealogical purposes. A 16- or 17-year old party should have given parental details before the ceremony. If details are to be given by others this should be in a consistent form, not dependent entirely on whom a party regards as its 'parent', which might be positively misleading to others. I should either require it, or not provide for it at all; but I should not make it optional.

Chapter 10: Validity and offences

Consultation Question 57:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I agree to 1-3.

I appreciate that the terms of Reference do not allow the Commission to propose a change from the current law as stated at (4); but I find this a quite excessive sanction for couples who marry against the wishes of a hierarchy. A proportionate ecclesiastical penalty on the officiant would be quite enough.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

This does not clearly cover deliberately misleading information from the parties when the schedule/marriage document is issued. These are more than mistakes, and under the current law might well render a publication of banns 'undue' and so void. I would leave solemnization under such circumstances void.

Subject to that, I agree with (1).

(2) and (3) correspond with the current law and are quite acceptable.

Consultation Question 58:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

My reservations regarding 1(ii) are the same as expressed above.

Otherwise my answers must be coloured by my conviction, expressed at the outset, that the unsolemnized contract of marriage continues to exist, albeit with minimal legal consequences.

I also believe the Nullity of Marriage Act 1971 confused an existing and continuing distinction by its use of the terms void and voidable. There was and remains a difference between a marriage void (for example) for incest, which cannot even be contracted, and a contract of marriage which is not solemnized as the law requires (whether that be the common law requirement of an attendant clerk, or the statutory requirements since 1753). The former is nothing, the latter is an unsolemnized contract. (When the 1753 Act described defectively solemnized marriages as 'null and void' it was relying on the common but imprecise terminology which used 'marriage' to mean 'solemnized marriage', and it really meant that the solemnization would be void.)

If consent is vitiated by duress etc. there is initially no contract and thus no marriage at all, but consent can be given later, preventing annulment once such consent is given or presumed, which is why the marriage is now termed 'voidable'. The backdating of such a marriage to the ceremony is a legal fiction.

If consent is never expressed, there is nothing at all. There cannot be a solemnization of marriage without a contract to solemnize. But it remained possible - though rare - beyond 1753 for a marriage to be contracted first and solemnized later. Since, in that case, failure to give notice (1(ii)) or to express consent at the ceremony (2) would be defects of form, the result would be an unsolemnized contract. I find this a more helpful terminology than 'non-qualifying ceremony', though it is true that the ceremony would have no effect.

As stated above, if consent is never expressed, there is nothing at all. If consent is expressed but vitiated by duress etc. there is initially no contract and thus no marriage at all, but consent can be given later, preventing annulment once such consent is given or presumed, which is why the marriage is now termed 'voidable'. The 3-year limit effectively presumes consent after that time, and I agree that under some circumstances that would be an unrealistic presumption.

It is important that if the actual or purported officiant has been led to do this by instigation on the part of one of the couple, that person should also be liable to prosecution as an accessory.

No

Please expand on your answer:

I agree with the parliamentarians of 1970 - and therefore disagree with the Commission - regarding the equivalence of the exceptional discretion conferred on the Registrar-General in cases of terminal illness to the legatine powers of the Archbishop of Canterbury. In both cases an exceptional dispensation from normal procedures is being granted, under a power entrusted by Parliament to a senior public officer. If Siperintendent Registrars were capable of taking this decision for secular solemnization, parish clergy would have been equally capable of taking it in cases of ecclesiastical solemnization.

Consultation Question 65:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Again, the point is that this is an dispensation from normal requirements in an exceptional situation. If the party concerned is neither dead nor married within three months, then the situation is clearly not as exceptional as was supposed. The provision made in 1970 seems correct.

Consultation Question 66:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

In this case there is a good chance that the circumstances making normal procedures impractical will last for more than 12 months.

Consultation Question 67:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

My understanding of a marriage with full legal consequences as a solemnized contract comes into play here. The ontologically important step is the contract, and it was always possible for a contract of marriage to be concluded by proxy. There was therefore never a requirement for the contracting parties to be in the same place at the same time. The decline in marriages by proxy was due only to solemnization requirements, and these are a matter for parliament to regulate (directly or, as suggested here, by delegation to ministers).

Consultation Question 70:

Please share your views below:

I see no particular need for this. I should also be concerned if a party were enabled to marry on his own private yacht; since the relationship he would have as master of that vessel with the officiant, as a passenger, would possibly deprive the officiant of that control of the ceremony which some of your other proposals assume.

Consultation Question 72:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I agree with these but I should also allow religious and belief ceremonies at which officiants who were duly nominated to serve as such ashore, but currently under contract to serve as cruise ship chaplains (whether as employees or independent contractors of the cruise line), would officiate. I appreciate the need for the cruise line to have control, but that would be the case also in a chaplaincy situation. I would not allow a passenger to officiate merely because, by coincidence, he was a minister of religion or humanist celebrant.

On the high seas there is no diocesan jurisdiction and the clergy of episcopal churches should be free to take, as conscience dictates, decisions which might, on land, belong to their superiors in the hierarchy.

I agree subject to what I have said regarding religious and belief ceremonies.

Consultation Question 73:

Please share your views below:

I am not sure this is a realistic question. If the possibility has not hitherto existed on English-registered ships, it is quite possible that people who would have liked to marry on board by religious rites have not thought it worth expressing their desire. That does not mean it does not exist. There is certainly demand for religious worship on cruise ships, and in the interest of choice - which appears to motivate many of the Commission's other proposals - I believe my proposal to treat contracted ship's chaplains similarly to deck officers trained as officiants is the right compromise.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

I have no evidence to offer. But it is absurd to suggest that the current law prevents anybody from getting married. Whether it discourages marriage, and the proposed reforms would lead to more marriages, I am unsure.

I would not use the term 'legally married'. One is either (i) not contracted in marriage (and therefore not married in any sense). or (ii) contracted in the sight of God in a way the law recognises, but without valid solemnization and therefore very few consequences, or (iii) party to a solemnized contract, with the full range of consequences normally associated with marriage.

The only point I would make about costs under the 2005 Regulations as amended is that their application to religious premises hosting civil partnership formation was a serious obstacle to churches, which were already registered for opposite sex marriage and wished to host all life union formation equally, seeking approval. The example of local authorities which set the approval fee at the same level as that for o-s marriage registration was, unfortunately, not followed by many others. This fee should always have been set nationally. However, that point probably lies outside your Terms of Reference.

Please expand on your answer:

I think such a provision, though possibly inconvenient, has been established to prevent hasty and possibly fraudulent marriage ceremonies. To remove it would invite abuse.

Consultation Question 5:

Yes

I think the interview should always be in a verifiable person-to-person format, but that could possibly be achieved through internet media such as FaceTime. It is important to guard against sham and forced marriages.

Consultation Question 8:

I think there would need to be very clear guidelines as to what exceptional circumstances would justify a relaxation of the usual rules

Consultation Question 9:

Consultation Question 12:

It would seem to be unsatisfactory to postpone a wedding just because of unforeseen circumstances preventing the original officiant attending/

Please share your views below:

I'm not sure what this question is asking, but I would be wary of providing an 'open door' for any old 'officiant' to act.

Consultation Question 13:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Particularly in border areas, I think this could prove unreasonably restrictive.

Consultation Question 14:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

It seems an archaic rule

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

I think the rules currently require the bans to be read in both the bride and groom's churches, and that this obviously provides additional security against illegal weddings. The rule should therefore NOT be altered.

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

I think both requirements are necessary

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

Yes, I think that is a sensible precaution.

Consultation Question 18:

Anglican preliminaries should continue to be recognised as legal preliminaries to weddings officiated by the Church of England and the Church in Wales;
or

Please expand on your answer:

I doubt that civil preliminaries provide enough public scrutiny

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

These are all necessary minimum safeguards

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I think this would unfairly obstruct and restrict churches who have no minister, yet have congregants who have strong spiritual and emotional ties to their church.

Consultation Question 21:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

That seems reasonable, (unless the current rules demand two officiants). I would not favour any changes that made fraudulent marriages easier.

Consultation Question 22:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Such clerks should possess sufficient training, gravitas, and religious conviction to be relied upon to perform their duties with appropriate seriousness.

Consultation Question 23:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I don't think people of "non-religious belief organisations" ( e.g atheists or humanists) should be entrusted with such solemn responsibilities

Consultation Question 24:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Frankly, such a loose definition opens the door to any cult or lunatic-fringe sect that might wish to conduct trivialised 'weddings'

Please share your views below:

Clearly such a list would be a minefield for disputes, but do we really want 'weddings conducted by irreverent entities like "The Magic Tooth Fairy"? Because, if we don't (as we obviously shouldn't), then it is much safer to uphold the current rules.

Consultation Question 25:

No

Please expand on your answer:

As in the answer to the question above, such a relaxation would allow Satanists, witches, and any ungodly organisation to make a mockery of marriage

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

In principle the law should expressly exclude bogus organisations, but the difficulty will be in agreeing a list of what the law regards as bogus. The proviso that such organisations would be those who "promote purposes that are unlawful or contrary to public policy and morality" will prove utterly inadequate. The constant downgrading of morality will immediately render the distinction unenforceable. e.g will it prevent polygamy or even trans-human unions, i.e between humans and animals? Only the unchanging yardstick laid down by Almighty God in Scripture can stand the test of time and degrading public morality. Of course that has already been breached with dire consequences in legalising same-sex unions.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

I think I have made my reservations clear enough already

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Certainly a public list should be kept, but I do not think NRBOs should be eligible.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I am firmly opposed to independent officiants. Not only would they degrade to solemnity of marriage, but they would have an undesirable tendency to commercialise the process of officiating by introducing competitive services

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Certainly any authorised officiant should be responsibly selected and approved.

Consultation Question 31:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

These are reasonable minimum requirements

Consultation Question 32:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Absolutely. Officiating must not become a competitive business.

Consultation Question 33:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There should be a set and reasonable fee, to protect couples from exploitation.

Consultation Question 34:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I'm not sure I understand the issue

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Absolutely.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

But I'm not sure I could trust the GRO to compose suitable guidelines without qualified input from established religious authorities.

Consultation Question 37:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I'm not sure about that. Obviously it risks cranky organisations perpetuating aberrations inherent in their defective and ungodly belief system

Consultation Question 38:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, but to whom might appeal be made if the GRO becomes a protector of aberrant practices and a persecutor of those who uphold traditional biblical practices?

Consultation Question 39:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

As above

Consultation Question 40:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Age should be no barrier, though clearly senility should be cause for withdrawal of authority

Consultation Question 41:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I fear that "professional development" will inevitably include promotion of unbiblical and unnatural forms of so-called marriage. It will thus lead to the unfair and damaging elimination of Christian registrars and accelerate moral decline

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

There needs to be a certain level of formal documentation, both to deter frivolity and coercion.

Consultation Question 43:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I think that is too open-ended and in no way guards against people proposing frivolous or profane ceremonies. The GRO must stipulate some guidelines and limitations in accordance with custom and answers to earlier questions.

Consultation Question 44:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

See answer above: Some guidelines and limitations are necessary

Consultation Question 45:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Clearly people of faith may sometimes choose to have a civil ceremony and should be entitled to include religious content

Please share your views below:

Obviously, participants must be allowed, even encouraged, to treat their marriage as being consecrated in the presence of Almighty God.

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Circumstances beyond participants' control, may cause them to have to resort to a civil ceremony, but they should certainly NOT be prevented from sanctifying it with a religious ceremony subsequently, usually in the company of their church friends.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The traditional Open Doors rule makes a valuable and important statement that a wedding is a public affair, of interest to the wider society and not just to the bride and groom.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

That is far too loose and invites ridiculous and inappropriate venues, that would bring the wedding ceremony into disrepute. There must be guidelines and limits.

Please share your views below:

I know this is a very difficult issue, but don't you think that a wedding in the air---e.g. during a free fall descent, would inevitably be too rushed and utterly incompatible with the solemnity of the occasion?

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The Public should always be entitled to witness weddings, though this could be from a reasonable distance as long as the proceedings are audible to everyone.

Consultation Question 50:

No

No

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Use of religious venues for atheist. humanist ceremonies would be entirely inappropriate and would invite people to misuse churches to provide a false and insincere impression of solemnity and tradition. But religious ceremonies can perfectly well be conducted in non-religious venues, because, the building is irrelevant and will sometimes confer a bogus impression that the participants have been blessed by God.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Officiants will need some guidance--it can't be totally carte-blanche.

Consultation Question 52:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

GRO guidance should expand on that and specify that condition.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Probably the GRO would benefit from some expert advice from qualified religious authorities

Consultation Question 53:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I would think that locations that frequently host weddings are clearly suitable.

Please share your views below:

I really don't have any idea

Chapter 8: Registration

Consultation Question 54:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Those details would seem to be essential and common sense.

Consultation Question 55:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

People should be entitled to use their own 'first language'.

Consultation Question 56:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I suppose that is moving with the times.

Chapter 10: Validity and offences

Consultation Question 57:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Clause 4 is needed to prevent same-sex marriage 'partners' falsely using churches which have deliberately refrained from giving consent to unbiblical practices.

No

Please expand on your answer:

There must be witnesses and , surely must at least be required to sign the wedding register document. Why would anyone want to remove such a requiremnet?

Consultation Question 58:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Those seem to be obvious reasons to invalidate the marriage. After all, they are hardly onerous.

Consultation Question 59:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I'm not sure. Surely non-consummation of a wedding has always been grounds for nullifying the marriage. Why should that condition be removed?

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Otherwise, their marriage ceremony would be rendered superfluous

Consultation Question 60:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Lack of consent should be sufficient grounds in itself, regardless of any period of time.

Chapter 11: Special types of wedding

Consultation Question 62:

Please share your views below:

I don't know what the current law is, but I think weddings should be allowed to take place in hospitals if necessary and in houses where one member is bedbound. I tend to think prison weddings are inappropriate.

Consultation Question 63:

That is probably a sensible precaution, especially in the case of an illness affecting mental capacity

Consultation Question 69:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I am not sure that marriages in international waters would have geographical/ national validity

Consultation Question 70:

Please share your views below:

I don't know, but authorising weddings on cruise ships would obviously raise challenges about the eligibility of an unlimited variety of other vessels.

Consultation Question 71:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I don't think such wedding venues should be authorised at all, then the 'problem' of not knowing who would officiate, would not arise.

Consultation Question 72:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

See answers above. Cruise ship romances are highly likely to occur, but I think it would be a sensible limitation if the would-be partners should be required to abide by the usual requirements of weddings on land.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Some such precautions against hasty and possibly bogus marriages.

There probably is, but I think it would be safer for all concerned if they were lot legalised.

No

Please expand on your answer:

Please see my other answers above. Such provisions indicate some of the problems that such weddings will cause.

Chapter 12: Fees

Consultation Question 75:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Fair enough

Consultation Question 76:

(1) the same fee as other cases in which the registration officer must travel to the person giving notice, set nationally on a cost-recovery basis; or

I don't think 'compassion' should affect the fee.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It shouldn't be possible for anyone to get married without being present at the ceremony

It would make a farce of marriage allowing couples to say anything they like or nothing at all - the current public declarations should be retained. There is already a large amount of flexibility in the wedding ceremony.

Couples should state at the ceremony that there are no impediments and that they are both freely giving consent to the lifetime commitment they are entering into.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a serious lifetime commitment - to allow a couple to water down the ceremony would demonstrate a wrong view of marriage, since a wedding is a public declaration in which society and the state have an interest. In fact, it has been reported in the news concerning various unofficial wedding ceremonies which have been based on film plots, fairy stories and couples dressing up strangely (e.g hedgehogs). It is very doubtful that many of these reflected how seriously marriage should be taken.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Since there is still a problem in our society with forced marriage, it would be crazy to not keep weddings as public events. Marriage should keep the public nature of the wedding declarations, since removing the requirement would encourage a false perception that marriage is a private matter without any public significance.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Forced marriages would be much easier to do if they could be done anywhere.

Please share your views below:

Venues should not simply be allowed because marrying couples want them, but because they are appropriate places to hold such a significant ceremony. Unofficial wedding ceremonies have taken place in an S&M dungeon, underwater, and at a Comic Book convention with a couple dressed as comic book heroes. It would be completely incompatible with the dignity of marriage for venues like these to host legal weddings

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Wedding ceremonies are public declarations, and without this public accessibility the meaning of marriage is weakened and forced marriages are easier to do.

No. The logic of banns is that they enable a group of people who nominally know the couple to raise legal objections. This cannot be done so well if a narrower group of people are asked (i.e. people at only one church, not three).

However, I accept that often wherever Banns are read neither the future bride or future groom are known anyway.

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

I am clergy. I would be glad to check evidence that proved the legality of the proposed marriage. I would also be glad of any system which enabled me to more easily notice dodgy activity on the part of one or both of the couple. So meeting the couple separately seems good. However, it may introduce much more work for clergy in parishes with lots of weddings -- clergy who are usually over-worked already.

Consultation Question 23:

Please expand on your answer:

Legal safeguard must be put in place to ensure anyone nominated as an officiant is properly trained, subject to oversight, etc.

Consultation Question 24:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Without this definition, almost all organisations which may wish to hold weddings in line with their own views could be classed as either religious or non-religious secular. Presumably not all such organisations ought by default to qualify.

Also, a marriage ceremony must be seen to be a solemn ceremony within whichever tradition or belief system it is being held.

Please share your views below:

Yes there should be a list. Excluded organisations should include any which are theme or hobby based or based on fandom (e.g. a fanclub for a fictional quasi-religious set of characters).

A marriage ceremony must be seen to be a solemn ceremony within whichever tradition or belief system it is being held. Any organisation which would simply be offering marriage as a 'service' provided to its members and not as an integral part of a way of life promoted by that organisation should be excluded.

Consultation Question 25:

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

No marriage ceremony should be seen also to be an endorsement or commitment to any 'purposes that are unlawful or contrary to public policy or morality.' Organisation promoting such should not necessarily be discriminated against when it comes to the new provisions in law for marriage. However, they must be able to demonstrate that their marriage ceremonies will not be co-opted for the promotion of 'purposes that are unlawful or contrary to public policy or morality.'

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

No. Named individuals only as a safeguard.

Consultation Question 28:

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I do not feel that officiating at a wedding should be possible for an independent who is disconnected from an organisation committed to maintaining the solemnity of marriage (e.g. civil authorities or religious organisations).

I suggest those wishing to be independent officiants are registered with the local authority to work on their behalf.

Moreover, many aspects of the wedding business have been commercialised, but the solemnising itself should not be. Especially as independent officiants may be able to command a higher fee by offering a more flexible service in which the solemnity of marriage is undermined by a willingness to incorporate inappropriate requests by the couple.

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

There must be clear guidelines about what 'fit and proper' means with power given to civil authorities to inspect those who are appointed to check the guidelines are being followed.

Consultation Question 33:

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes. This responsibility must extend to the whole marriage service part of the wedding day. Clear guidelines must be set out to explain what constitutes dignity and solemnity. Couples must be obliged to keep to these guidelines. It would put an officiant under too much pressure if they could ever be seen as the 'obstacle' to the kind of ceremony a couple wants on the basis of a merely personal definition of dignified and solemn.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The schedule should contain a declaration that the couple have already expressed their consent. However, the ceremony itself MUST contain a verbal expression of consent (or, only where speech is impossible, some other public declaration). The phrase 'whether orally or otherwise' should only be interpreted along these lines. The law and society has an interest in marriage and it must not be allowed to become a wholly private or personalised affair. A prescribed form of words already exists in the Marriage Act 1949 and should be retained.

Re. para 2: the General Register Office must reserve the right to critique any proposed form of words which does not sufficiently express in close relation to the words of consent that marriage is exclusive and permanent, i.e. what the couple are consenting to by consenting to be married must be made clear.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I agree that the parties may choose the form and ceremony -- i.e. a Jewish couple must have access to a Jewish ceremony. However, this does not mean that a couple may devise an entirely personalised form of words or ceremony with the officiant. There must be guidelines in place to restrict changes to the form of words used to express consent. Furthermore, any ceremony devised must maintain the dignity and solemnity of marriage. Reports of some non-legally binding marriage ceremonies suggest a willingness to conduct bizarre and inappropriate ceremonies. This must not be legally permitted. The degeneration of marriage would be a blight on society, not a sign of progress. For a couple to be required to come to terms with the solemnity of marriage and with requirements imposed by wider society better reflects the nature of marriage than to allow a couple to determine what marriage will look like for them.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The Open Doors rule is a protection against forced or bigamous marriages. Also, it is symbolically representative of the public interest in all marriages. A significant factor in the stability of marriages, which is especially important for children, is that they are entered into publicly, not secretly. This makes a married couple accountable to society thereby promoting social cohesion, not disintegration. The Open Doors policy helps reinforce this aspect of marriage both to the guests and the couple.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is highly desirable to make a range of presently unregistered venues possible locations for marriage, especially where religious communities do not own their own premises. However, it is paramount that the venue chosen is consistent with the solemnity and dignity of marriage and does not cheapen it or obscure its nature. A dignified marriage could take place on a paddle steamer, but not on a power boat, for example.

Also, clear guidelines must be given as to what is an appropriate location and officiants must be empowered to rule out certain locations without feeling any pressure to conform to a couples wishes. For example, a venue must be able to accomodate the legal minimum number of guests. It should not be associated with any activities which undermine marriage -- such a brothel, strip club, etc. It is not good for the country to allow weddings to be degraded in this way.

If guidance cannot be enforced and inappropriate venues are likely to be chosen, they should not be legalised in the first place.

in the air, and/or

Please share your views below:

I only suggest restricting 'in the air' weddings as they sound like a novelty. A wedding could conceivably take place on an airliner packed with guests or in a hot air balloon, but this begins to sound like the novelty of the 'venue' has taken priority over the solemnity of the event. This would not be the case with a woodland wedding, or a wedding in a private home (albeit I think an open door policy ought to be in operation even there.)

Consultation Question 49:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Public access should not be prevented where it is possible. However, venues which are not readily accesible to the public should be permitted.

Consultation Question 50:

Other

No

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Within the Church of England I feel the law ought to prohibit non-religious weddings. However, each religious organisation should have freedom to choose how its premises are used.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

- 1) This would put officiants under pressure from couples to approve locations; they would not feel free to make up their own mind.
- 2) less scrupulous officiants could charge increased fees for their added felxibility.
- 3) This would be a very subjective process. Instead, strict guidlines should be used which constrain the officiant. Why would an officiant turn down money just to avoid officiating in a venue they *felt* was inappropriate when there are no objective criteria to confirm that hunch?

Consultation Question 52:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

But definitions of the words 'safe' and 'dignified' must be given. Otherwise this is entirely subjective and those who stand to profit from hotsing weddings at their venues will simply start recommending the officiants they know who will decide the venue is safe and dignified. In other wirds, this proposal is no safeguard at all.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This advice must be made available, but it must be stronger than advice otherwise there is too much social and financial pressure to ignore it.

Consultation Question 53:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

If the decision is made to make officiants responsible for approving venues, it seems sensible to have in place a set of standards which a venue will benefit from meeting. This is pointless, though, if officiants are, in practice, given carte blanche to spontaneously approve any venue.

Please share your views below:

This will only work if there is an incentive for venues to be pre-approved. This is only possible if officiants cannot spontaneously approve any venue. It must be the case that an officiant can much more easily approve a venue if it has 'pre-approval'. Therefore it must be difficult for an officiant to approve a new unapproved venue.

Perhaps officiants should be required to make personal visits to unapproved venues before approving them. This could be listed as a chargeable service so that it is cheaper to choose pre-approved venues. Many venues currently used for weddings would automatically be 'pre-approved'. To become 'pre-approved' a venue would have to host e.g. ten weddings (after a visit and approval by the officiant of each wedding; perhaps at least 5 visits by different officiants should be required). A venue would be able to offer proof that e.g. 10 weddings had taken place there and as a result receive 'pre-approved' status from the local authority.

Any vessel which is designed to accomodate a significant number of passengers, so that the public nature of marriage may be reflected. That means any vessel like a cruise ship, but not speed boats, or sail boats.

Consultation Question 71:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I agree oly insofar as the cruise ship company may promise an officiant but not know who will be on duty that day. If the couple is taking along a privately engaged officiant, they must supply the name. So the nae could eithe rbe the name of the officiant OR 'the duty officiant of the cruise ship'.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

The biggest factor preventing marriages by those who are not opposed to them is cost. Making a wider range of venues available may help, but not if it increases the commercialisation of weddings.

Consultation Question 86:

Any increased costs decrease the occurrence of weddings.

I attended one. The venue had to change due to social distance restrictions and the numbers attending were limited to 30 so that made it very difficult for the couple getting married to choose who could come in the light of the fact that they were a large family.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

I think an in person interview should take place every time with relevant ID provided. I think there is more potential for a remote system to be open to abuse for those who might want to exploit the system in some way

Consultation Question 16:

They should be able to call for documentary evidence to support the marriage request but that evidence must be handled in lines with GDPR regulations.

The process should have an in-person element to it.

If for example a church has less than 20 who meet regularly for worship but have someone in that congregation who is competent to officiate then I would suggest they should be allowed to. It seems to me it should be more on the competency and integrity of the officiant as opposed to the size of the 'organisation'

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

I would not be in favour of this action as living in a society that largely rejects Christian morality at present this would open up a legal door to shut down the church. The definition of promoting purposes contrary to public morality is open to abuse and mis-use

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Even though preliminaries may have checked that there is no impediment to being married I feel to maintain the solemnity and dignity of this lifetime commitment that the ceremony should still include the willingness of the parties to publicly declare that this is the case.

Whilst ceremonies may reflect different belief systems I feel the process of giving consent should be standard so that whoever you are, whatever marriage you might attend that you can recognise and know when consent is being given, as the wording of the ceremony is always clear on that issue not just for those getting married but for those watching and attending.

One of the key purposes of the marriage ceremony is to make that public expression of consent and thus that should be part of the service supported, as now, with a signing of document that will be evidence from that time on that a public declaration of consent has been made.

I feel strongly that the public declaration of no impediment and of consent should remain as recognised wording within the ceremony requirements.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I am concerned that this will take away from the solemnity and dignity of the marriage. A ceremony should be appropriate to such a life significant event and not solely about the interests of the couple. The idea that it should be meaningful to the couple should also apply to other interested parties such as society. The ceremony should reflect to society and the state that this commitment is one that is taken seriously. It may be difficult to define but there should be some guidelines to ensure some degree of dignity about the marriage commitment which I feel may be lost if it is simply up to an officiant to be happy with the ceremony arrangements.

Consultation Question 46:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

If this means having a religious service with an officiant going through that process again after a civil wedding ceremony then I don't see the need for the legal bit to be done twice. I don't have an objection if someone wants to follow up a civil wedding ceremony with a religious service. I know of several occasions where couples who wanted to have a religious ceremony found that this was not possible and had to have a civil ceremony to satisfy legal requirement but later on then had the religious ceremony that they wanted (without the legal bit which took place in the civil ceremony). I have no objection to the latter scenario taking place.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I think public access and open door policy should remain as it communicates the public nature of marriage but is also an added protection against the likes of forced marriages.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Whilst an expansion of the venues in which weddings can take place may have some advantages I think there should be safeguards that the location is one that promotes the solemnity and seriousness of the commitment being made and not just give free for all for those getting married to marry anywhere they choose. Locations should also be practical in allowing for the public declarations to be made and heard by all and an open doors policy to continue to operate.

on inland waters such as lakes or rivers,, in the air, and/or, in private homes.

Please share your views below:

I feel that ceremonies outdoors would be sensible especially under these times of Covid 19 and social distancing. Outdoors weddings could provide a sensible alternative. I feel that weddings in the air, on water or in private homes are potentially venues that would limit the public nature of the ceremony especially if an 'open door' policy is maintained in the public interest.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 50:

Other

Other

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I'm not sure it would be appropriate to legally prohibit civil weddings/non religious belief weddings from taking place in religious venues but I feel it should be up to the venue 'owners' if they want to allow that to happen. I don't feel that the religious venues should be forced to allow civil weddings/non religious belief weddings if they don't want to either.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I am happy for the officiant to decide on location approval but again if the location owner is not happy for the wedding to take place on their premises then the officiant should not have powers to force the wedding to take place on the participants desired location.

Consultation Question 52:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Further guidelines on what we mean by dignified would be welcome. Safeguards need to be put in place.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, but perhaps they should seek consultation on this.

Consultation Question 53:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

My concern is that a venue should have the right to accept or decline a request to have a wedding take place in their venue or location and that the officiant does not have power to overrule the wishes of the location owners.

A bit of a strange circular question. No would be the short answer. As the law, policy and morality can change over time, how can you exclude religious organisations that promotes purposes which the Law, policy or morality now disagree with. In effect this creates a state religion (typical of Communism) which changes over time.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This weakens marriage where marriage should be strengthened. You need to be at your own wedding - just signing a document makes it a contract like a house purchase!

Declarations is what makes a LEGAL marriage!

Dignity and Solemnity are thrown out under this proposal. This consultation needs to be written by someone that knows what they are talking about. Remember that the prescribed words are the minimum with couples being able to add their own so there is no need to mess about with the Legal aspects.

I don't understand why you want to help those who cheat and lie to their partner by removing safeguards.

You also need to understand that a wedding is not just about the couple. Their relatives and others (e.g. that would want to marry either of the couple) are impacted. Additionally the state has an interest in maintaining and improving the lives of society in general. Law and order will disappear, and chaos will result in a few generations.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Officiants should not be placed in this awkward and unnecessary position and it's not just the couple who have an interest in the marriage!

How about a couple in a ceremony dressed up like [REDACTED] and the [REDACTED] to make a political point to all those attending? Maybe such couples have their priorities the wrong way around or their mental state should be called into question!

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Again, the stupidity of this question is obvious. There is no need of a law to permit anywhere as there is no where else outside of anywhere is there?

As in previous answers, weddings outside of the current Law can't be weddings, just a gathering for a party!

Are couples restricted in location, after their wedding?

Other - note for point 3.

Mother and Father represents the biological providers of genetic material for the person being married. How these mothers and fathers identify is not relevant to the purpose, and also this can change. If the person is a non-biological father and mother then this should be identified as a step father/mother or other established words or symbols.

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The prescribed words reflect the seriousness of the commitment of marriage, with solemn promises made binding husband and wife as one for life. This is an important bulwark to protect marriage.

Making such promises in the presence of witnesses affirms the public nature of marriage.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Free choice can undermine the seriousness of the marriage ceremony and encourage spectacle rather than ceremony. Every effort should be made to protect the solemnity of marriage.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Open doors is an important safeguard to marriage, ensuring proceedings are reasonable, underlining the public nature of the commitment and protecting against violations of the law through bigamy or forced marriage.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Permitting marriages to take place anywhere significantly undermines the seriousness of marriage.

The important aspect of the marriage ceremony is in the promises made in the presence of witnesses. Preserving the integrity of the service is fundamental.

A wide choice of venues puts the focus on the event rather than the marriage.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a serious undertaking and so registrars and vicars are well trained. To allow anyone to officiate risks degrading the serious promises which are being made. Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It has always been the case that members of the parish/congregation can come along to witness a wedding. Keeping it public rather than behind closed doors, helps to protect against bigamous marriages. Marriage forms the backbone of society and communities so it seem right to celebrate this by maintaining an open door policy

This needs careful thought because organisations which might really be more like political parties or lobby groups than a genuine belief system, could have a set of policies which (arguably) might claim to fulfill this criteria e.g. through education policies in particular.

Consultation Question 25:

Yes

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

The term 'contrary to public policy or morality' is subjective and suggests the ability to legally officiate at weddings might in the longer run depend on being in step with whatever the prevailing popular orthodoxy says about sexuality, morality and relationships.

In churches which could be described as having 'traditional values' about relationships and marriage between a man and a woman, it is crucial that they do not get forced to change their existing, official policies simply to continue to be able to officiate at weddings as they currently do, including in the church of England.

Any exclusion criteria should not include anything relating to sexual ethics or morality. Anything beyond excluding organisations on grounds that they advocate the violent overthrow of democracy or the use of violence to further their cause risks undermining plurality.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I do not think this would be appropriate because it could potentially be used simply to seek publicity e.g. for election candidates and/or political parties even if the applications have no mention of political views.

Currently, although the church of England in particular must agree to marry all heterosexual couples who request a wedding ceremony, individual churches and ministers can rest assured that the ceremony will be in line with a standard format. Also there isn't a financial bonus for ministers of religion (at least in the church of England) to conduct a wedding ceremony even though a church as a venue does receive an arguably nominal amount in parochial fees.

I would not wish to see a market be created for so-called independent officiants at weddings, and would be concerned that venues such as churches should not be forced to accept any ceremony which deviates and would misrepresent their beliefs.

In the case of nominated independent representatives of religious organizations, any professional development obligations should lie with that organisation's governing body, not directly from the General Register Office.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I think it is inappropriate for there not to be a requirement to openly and publicly state that there is no impediment. This is about trust between those in a relationship.

I think there must be prescribed words in a marriage ceremony which should include a commitment to remain faithful 'till death us do part'.

This reflects the seriousness of the commitment being made by each person. It is hard to justify any lesser commitment on any public policy grounds because of high divorce rates and the harm done to children.

Marriage is a public declaration and very solemn and serious commitment for the remainder of one's life, not just a private celebration of a desire for each other which, if that were all that a wedding was about, may grow cold.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A legally binding wedding ceremony must reflect the seriousness of the commitment being made.

It is important to reflect this through prescribed words at some point in any legally binding wedding ceremony.

There are good reasons to do so on public policy grounds - for example, the exemption from inheritance tax between spouses is at least partly in recognition of the benefits of a long term monogamous relationship for stability to children and recognition of the sacrifices made e.g. by a wife of a career for the sake of her children, particularly if a husband dies while children are young.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The seriousness of a marriage justifies it being a public declaration of a commitment to that relationship.

Again, other areas of public policy do recognize that such as the inheritance tax exemption between spouses.

So, open doors remain an important part of the marriage.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I do not think this is appropriate because a legally binding wedding would not be visible and public in nature if in a private house or garden.

Again if couples are to benefit from exemption to inheritance tax (an important area of public policy) it seems appropriate that the ceremony be visible to the public by taking place in an appropriate venue.

outdoors,, on inland waters such as lakes or rivers,, in the air, and/or, in private homes.

Please share your views below:

I can believe that some advantages would be had for outdoor ceremonies which would allow the public at large to see the ceremony, but not anywhere. There should be reasonable access for the public - perhaps a test should be could a wheelchair user reasonably get to see this outdoor ceremony?

But ceremonies in private homes, inland waterways or 'in the air' (even a hot air balloon?!!) would not be appropriate for a legally binding wedding ceremony after which spouses would expect to benefit from important areas of public policy such as the inheritance tax exemption between spouses. Hence I don't think private homes (including gardens), aircraft, hot air balloons or inland waterways would be appropriate venues. Perhaps the open deck of a ship moored alongside a wharf is visible to the general public but I don't think being on the move is appropriate.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Again I think if a couple wish to benefit from a legally binding wedding ceremony for inheritance tax, they should marry in a publicly visible ceremony.

Consultation Question 50:

Yes

Yes

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 51:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes but only if the venue meets a test of being publicly accessible.

I don't think this is about wheelchair access to every possible venue everywhere, but rather the principle that the ceremony has an open door.

Consultation Question 52:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I think a suitable test for outdoor venues should be low background noise and reasonable wheelchair access, so not at the end of a busy runway, not up a mountain, not in a private house or in an aeroplane, and not somewhere likely to trivialise the ceremony e.g. certain funfair or amusement arcades.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As previously stated, marriage is serious and should be for life so measures should remain in place for it never to be undertaken spontaneously without serious thought.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

It is much easier to read body language and see if there are outside influences in an in-person interview. Remote interviews could easily miss important signals. This should not be too difficult to arrange and should be part of this very serious commitment.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

I think both parties should be seen. I believe that forced marriages still occur and women (I don't think it's ever men, in this case. But, if so, men as well.) should be protected.

I think this could lead to all sorts of organisations with inappropriate beliefs being responsible for a very serious institution. I think this could demean marriage in a very damaging way. Religious organisations answer to God which should prevent the dignity of marriage from being compromised.

Please share your views below:

None. Where would you draw the line? See above.

Consultation Question 25:

No

This would be open to abuse.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Too dangerous: what do they believe? And how easily marriage could be debased.

Consultation Question 30:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There should be more safeguards in place to ensure that the officiant is "fit and proper". How is that defined anyway? Interpretations could vary hugely.

Consultation Question 31:

No

Please expand on your answer:

As explained above, I think the system is good at the moment with only a limited number of people allowed to officiate. These people are in a responsible position and the system works very well. Why change it to a system which could be open to abuse?

Consultation Question 32:

Yes

Consultation Question 33:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This serious office should not be a money-making affair. Reasonable fees are fine but no limits would result in all sorts of consumer-led, materialistic weddings.

Consultation Question 34:

Please expand on your answer:

Independent celebrants should not be permitted.

Consultation Question 35:

No

Please expand on your answer:

That is a very subjective opinion. If the officiant is passionate about wildlife they may well think that a marriage in a zoo is dignified. I would disagree with that and can imagine there are even less dignified situations (a graveyard?). It's totally subjective.

1a suggests that you could now get married without being present in person ("or otherwise"). Please expand on your answer:

Marriage should remain a serious and dignified matter. This is such a subjective proposal that all sorts of undignified ceremonies would occur. It would be very difficult/ impossible for the officiant to refuse as he would have no objective measure to use.

Civil weddings work well at the moment. They are dignified, serious ceremonies which, in my experience, do not need to be changed.

I don't understand the question but think that it's fine to allow a religious ceremony after a civil service.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Such serious ceremonies should not be conducted behind closed doors. Closed doors suggest there may be something to hide.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

In the air? In a zoo? In a strip club? Marriage is a serious matter and would be debased by taking place in a "fun" location.

Not as far as I know though I would question the need for someone to marry in prison. They can surely wait, and it would appear that some marry because the non-detained person has fallen in love with an (odd) ideal. They cannot know each other well unless they knew each other before imprisonment.

Consultation Question 2:

Please share your views below:

Not applicable as we are an organisation

Consultation Question 3:

Please share your views below:

Not applicable as individuals as we are an organisation.

However, all WCC member organisations have found the Covid situation very difficult in terms of issuing appropriate guidance to celebrants and help to couples. This was mainly due to celebrant-led ceremonies not being specifically referred to in the guidance issued from government, whereas religious ceremonies were mentioned specifically.

Member organisations also report dealing with very upset couples who were unable to get help from local authority register offices when trying to sort out their wedding plans during lockdown.

It has been, and remains, a very difficult time for all celebrants whose income has ceased and very frustrating trying to unravel conflicting guidance.

Chapter 4: Preliminaries

Consultation Question 4:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree this requirement should be abolished.

This will make it easier for overseas couples wanting to marry here. At present the law makes it expensive financially and in terms of time to comply with the residency requirement and deters couples from marrying here at all.

Consultation Question 5:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree. To give notice online and attend an interview later makes it much easier for couples.

Consultation Question 6:

three days;

Please expand on your answer:

Three days should allow enough time for required paperwork, as well as lessening the burden on couples from overseas.

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

We think this is an appropriate power to include.

If, in the future, it is needed then this power could be of great benefit to couples.

Yes, a face to face interview option is going to be necessary if a sham or forced marriage is suspected.

Consultation Question 8:

Please share your views below:

Our view would be to continue these exceptions. To stop these existing exceptions would restrict some couples and go against the proposals to make the whole process of marrying easier.

Consultation Question 9:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We totally agree. The current system is very out of date and inappropriate as notices displayed in Register Offices are hardly looked at these days. A far more suitable and accessible system would be online.

Consultation Question 10:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This we believe is a suitable time frame.

Consultation Question 11:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

1. The officiant should definitely be named so that it can be clarified that they are authorised.
2. Yes definitely, a revised schedule detailing the new officiant should be provided in cases where a couple changes their celebrant, but the system of doing this would need to be speedy and quite straightforward.

Consultation Question 12:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes this is a very sensible proposal as such events will occur.

Please share your views below:

We think there could be other instances where a substitute officiant might be needed. These might include: family emergency relating to the death or illness of a close family member or a form of domestic crisis, and there may well be other instances.

However, it is worth noting that existing celebrants mostly already operate with a circle of colleagues for just such emergencies and unforeseen situations. They are therefore likely to be able to locate and propose a substitute authorised officiant in these instances.

Consultation Question 13:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree that this is no longer appropriate.

Consultation Question 14:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes this is clearly outdated and should be repealed.

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

We disagree that banns should be required to only be published in the church where the wedding is to take place, we think they should be able to be published in any church.

The proposals here seek to make the whole process of getting married easier, so a wider view in making it possible to have banns read anywhere is preferred.

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

1. We think that this may be difficult to implement as infrastructure is lacking to carry out such checks. It could be extremely burdensome so we would prefer that this is not required.
- 2). This would seem to be against the aim of simplifying the process so we do not agree that the clergy should be required to meet with the couple separately.

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

This is felt to be a matter for the Anglican church.

Consultation Question 18:

all weddings should be preceded by civil preliminaries.

Please expand on your answer:

We wholeheartedly support the proposal that ALL weddings are preceded by civil preliminaries. This will do so much to make the whole system easier and more understood by couples.

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We totally agree to proposals 1, 2, and 3.

It will be important that all authorised officiants are totally clear about how consent is given, that all other requirements are met and that the schedule is signed.

They will have undergone mandatory training on their rights and responsibilities regarding these elements. They will understand their legal duty and the offences that could apply if they fail in their duty (discussed in these proposals) will have been impressed upon officiants during their mandatory training.

The resulting system would be more straightforward and easily understood by couples as well as officiants.

Consultation Question 20:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree and feel it would be inappropriate and confusing if registrars were to carry out other types of weddings.

When considering this type of 'overlap', there is a question that arises about whether registration officers should also be able to act as independent celebrants.

This gives rise to further questions. Could, or should they, legally be prevented from doing so? Should they only be able to operate outside their employing local authority area? We would like to see some consideration of these issues if possible as this question will arise.

Consultation Question 21:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We totally agree. This will provide cost savings for Local Authorities and for couples as there is no need for two officiants to be paid to attend a wedding. It is perfectly possible, and more sensible, for one registration officer to officiate.

Consultation Question 22:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We feel that the situation should remain as is now and clerks in Holy Orders should be recognised as officiants by virtue of their office.

Consultation Question 23:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes, these organisation should have the responsibility for nominating their officiants and a public list made available.

Consultation Question 24:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We think the term 'secular' needs defining carefully as there are potential issues here.

The suggested definition is probably the best available at the present time, however there is a concern around a definition for organisations calling themselves 'non-religious belief' organisations. If the definition is too wide then lots of organisations with 'dubious' ideas and frameworks will spring up purely with the intention of conducting legal marriages. If the definition is too tight then it will deter genuine organisations.

Please share your views below:

We feel that a list is very difficult to create as there will always be exceptions, the emphasis needs to be more on the criteria for becoming such an organisation.

Consultation Question 25:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

1. We think that 20 is too low a number of members and suggest that at least 50 would appear to be a more suitable minimum number.

However, more important than a membership number is the overall criteria for being a religious or non-religious belief organisation.

2. We agree that the organisation should have a wedding service or a sincerely held belief about marriage. However, it will be important that the organisation has a very 'real' non-religious belief, far wider than issues just around marriage, that its members really believe in. The main aims and activities of such an organisation should focus on its belief system and the promotion of that.

We would also ask about potential monitoring or checks on such organisations. It is possible that such an organisation could become accepted as a non-religious belief organisation and after a period of time drop their activities around their belief system and simply promote their officiants to conduct weddings. We would suggest a consideration around monitoring this.

We would also ask if consideration has been given to a minimum length of time that such an organisation needs to have been established as this could deter organisations being formed for the wrong reasons.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Yes we agree that any organisation that promotes unlawful purposes or those contrary to public policy or morality should be excluded.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

As long as such organisations keep up to date lists then there should be no issue with officiants being nominated by office in addition to named individuals.

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree that the Registrar General's Office is the right office to have the responsibility for the public list of nominated officiants.

Consultation Question 29:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes we most definitely agree.

There are so many reasons why independent celebrants should have the ability to be authorised and included on the public list of officiants. These include:

- Couples themselves need to be the top priority and this would give them a much-needed choice in who conducts their wedding ceremony. It is very clear that celebrants are increasingly chosen by couples to lead their ceremony, indicative of the needs and wishes of today's couples. The celebrant sector would not be growing as it is if the couples were not choosing them to lead their ceremony.

- Celebrants can include different cultural and faith elements in a ceremony that can be tailored to the couple's exact needs. Couples with differing faiths really need this option, it is the only one they have.
- Celebrants having the ability to conduct legal marriage will attract more couples to get married, as they will be able to have the ceremony they really want.
- Celebrants are increasing in number, adding benefit to the economy, so enabling them to conduct legal marriage will grow the sector still further, including attracting more couples from overseas and lessening the number of couples from England and Wales choosing to marry overseas.
- England and Wales is out of step (and far behind) other countries where independent celebrants have been successfully conducting legal marriages for years.
- This would make the countries of the UK more similar to each other in how marriages are conducted.

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Guidance will be needed on what constitutes 'fit and proper' but this is definitely a criteria that is needed.

Consultation Question 31:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The mandatory training provided by the Registrar General's Office will obviously be very important for officiants.

The Wedding Celebrancy Commission (WCC) represents celebrants in England and Wales and offers any assistance to the Registrar General's Office in creating the mandatory training that will be required. The WCC Executive Council includes organisations which train the majority of celebrants in the UK (and some across the English-speaking world).

Consultation Question 32:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

It is agreed that the belief system of religious and non-religious belief organisations should be paramount, and they should therefore not make a profit from conducting weddings.

We would like to ask however if there are any thoughts on how this could be monitored.

Consultation Question 33:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Independent celebrants will need to run their celebrancy business independently and fees do not need to be limited as market forces will prevail.

However, further consideration of what in fact would be seen as a conflict of interest is required. Some independent celebrants may also provide other services such as catering or own a venue. Guidelines on how they may or may not act will be important to include in the mandatory training provided.

Consultation Question 34:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Couples must not be confused by what type of officiant an individual is, therefore we agree that this sort of cross over should not be possible.

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree that officiants should have this responsibility.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree it would be very appropriate for the General Register Office to issue this guidance.

Consultation Question 37:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree. The nominating organisation should have this responsibility.

Consultation Question 38:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree absolutely that the General Register Office should have this power and be able to step in where the nominating body fails to act appropriately.

Consultation Question 39:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We totally agree. Additionally we suggest there should be an effective complaints procedure if a problem is raised, which may be through a complaint from a couple. The method of complaining needs to be easy and quick and the response and action taken fast and appropriate.

Consultation Question 40:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree with this proposal.

Consultation Question 41:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We fully agree that continuing professional development is essential and if a celebrant fails to comply with the requirements then their authorisation should indeed lapse.

The Wedding Celebrancy Commission offers to assist with information on potential additional elements of continuing professional development that might apply to independent officiants, if this would be helpful.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree totally with all these proposals. The concept of consent in this document has been considered in great depth and is clear and easy to understand.

Consultation Question 43:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree with this proposal fully, this will give couples much more choice.

Consultation Question 44:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree with this proposal.

Consultation Question 45:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This was extensively discussed by members of WCC .

Our experience informs us that if a couple decides NOT to have their ceremony led by a religious officiant, and they choose a civil ceremony, then large amounts of religious content are unlikely to be requested. We agree the ceremony should always be identifiable as a civil ceremony.

Please share your views below:

As stated above, couples choosing a civil ceremony will not tend to ask for overly religious content. However, anything that involves individuals pledging themselves to God (essentially an 'act of worship') is not felt to be appropriate in a civil ceremony. However, religious readings, hymns, prayers and the use of symbols and religious music should be permitted.

Many couples with differing faith backgrounds turn to celebrants as it is the only way they can include elements from both faiths, which is one reason why there should be as little restriction as possible. However, clear guidance would need to be provided by the General Register Office.

Consultation Question 46:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree that this should be repealed.

Consultation Question 47:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This is outdated and o longer appropriate and should be repealed.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We totally agree. Weddings should be able to take place anywhere. The existing system of approved venues restricts ceremonies to approved premises.

However, there will need to be some guidance for nominated officiants about what to look for in approving a location. The Wedding Celebrancy Commission is well placed and willing to assist with examples of ceremony locations that are requested.

Please share your views below:

We think that there should be no limitations on these categories of venue. The officiant is best placed to assess the location. Health and safety, and other relevant checks, will be made by them under the proposed system.

Consultation Question 49:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree that this is not an appropriate requirement today.

Consultation Question 50:

Yes

Yes

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

If these restrictions are not introduced then potentially guests and even couples could be confused about what sort of ceremony is being held.

Consultation Question 51:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Officiants will be by far the best people to have this responsibility.

Consultation Question 52:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree with this proposal fully.

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Yes the General Register Office is best placed to deliver this guidance.

Consultation Question 53:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree that there should be a pre-approval process, it makes sense to do this.

It is important that the process looks very different to the current licensing process so that venues understand the difference and it does not simply become the current system under a different name because this will continue to limit choice and options for couples.

Please share your views below:

1) Local Authority Registration Services are best placed to create and maintain such a listing.

2) We believe it should have a base of the current venues already approved for marriages with this feeding into a national online register. To stay on the pre-approved listing an ongoing assessment, say every 3 years, could be carried out.

Chapter 11: Special types of wedding

Consultation Question 62:

Please share your views below:

We would just like to mention that nominated officiants could work in hospitals and hospices. These individuals would be ideally placed to assist couples wanting to marry where one or both are incapacitated or on an end of life care pathway.

Chapter 12: Fees

Consultation Question 75:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree but would add the fee needs to be 'reasonable'.

Consultation Question 76:

(2) a separate fee from other forms of giving notice, set nationally on compassionate grounds at below cost level.

Please expand on your answer:

On compassionate grounds we prefer to see as low a fee as possible.

Consultation Question 77:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We really do feel that an national fee should apply in this case to ensure marriage is affordable to all couples.

Consultation Question 78:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree that a cost recovery basis should be the basis for settings this fee but wide variations in fees between local authorities are bound to occur if not monitored.

Consultation Question 79:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We do agree with the proposal but would encourage a more nationally determined fee to avoid wide variations in charges.

Consultation Question 80:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree with this proposal for a standardised hourly rate. The effect of this measure would be to keep the fees charged at a reasonable level.

Consultation Question 81:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 82:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 83:

(2) there should be no fee.

Please expand on your answer:

On compassionate grounds we would support no fees to be payable when a party is terminally ill.

Consultation Question 84:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We agree with this proposal and WCC offers to assist in any way possible in a consideration of the type of fees that might be payable by independent celebrants wishing to become nominated officiants.

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

1) The Wedding Celebrancy Commission believes that current marriage law definitely discourages couples from marrying in many ways which include the following:

- Civil marriage processes are currently bureaucratic, lengthy and complicated and couples don't always understand them.
- Appointments at register offices and visiting them during their opening times can be difficult for couples under the current system.
- Limitations on venues means that couples cannot have their wedding in a location personal to them, such as their parent's home.
- Couples wanting to hold a statutory '2 x 2' ceremony often find this is difficult and very restricted to obtain.
- In many cases it is very expensive to hold a wedding at an approved venue under current law so many couples will not in fact marry at all because of this.
- If a celebrant - led ceremony is required then couples have to hold two events, and usually these have to be on different days. The Wedding Celebrancy Commission has a vast amount of information about the difficulties couples experience with this system - couples really dislike this system and desperately want just one event at one location and time on one date.
- Ceremony content is limited - couples want more choice in ceremony content which they want to be more personal. They often want to reflect differing faiths and cultures, recognising their individual backgrounds and want the content to be totally personal and unique in this and many other ways.
- Who can legally marry a couple is highly restricted under the current law. Couples cannot have an independent celebrant or a person from a non-religious belief organisation conduct their legal marriage. Therefore, they are less likely to marry at all.
- Current law is outdated and inappropriate in many areas and is out of step with marriage law in much of the rest of the world and even in the UK, especially Scotland and Northern Ireland.

2) Undoubtedly lifting the current legal restrictions in line with the proposals in this document will address the effects listed in 1) above and more couples will choose to marry and have the ceremony that they really want.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1. All members of the Wedding Celebrancy Commission are in regular contact with practicing wedding celebrants and have numerous examples to hand detailing how availability and costs of register office weddings affects couples seeking to marry. Stephanie Pywell's well documented research into '2 x 2' weddings supports WCC members' awareness and knowledge of this issue.

It difficult to book a 2 x 2 marriage, and virtually impossible to find any details of them on many council websites. Couples have be very determined to have a 2 x 2 statutory ceremony, which of course they are entitled to.

Very limited dates, times and locations are available in many registration districts and the practice of deregistering marriage rooms so they become approved venues, with associated higher fees for hiring them, is now in virtually all areas.

2. Approved venues currently pay fees to be 'approved' as a venue suitable for legal marriage. These additional costs are then passed on to couples. Venues then need to hold a certain number of weddings to justify the fees they have paid. So only larger and more expensive venues are usually 'approved premises', restricting choice for couples.

If couples choose a non-approved venue, they must hold two events to become legally married. Not a good choice for couples.

3. This is really a matter for the various religious organisations as the costs incurred will vary enormously.

4. Couples can hold a ceremony that is not legal, such as a celebrant-led ceremony, in non-approved venues and do the formalities with a register office '2 x 2' ceremony. This is costly but still could be cheaper for couples than having the whole event at a venue approved for legal marriage. The cost implications are currently a minefield for couples trying to work within a budget.

5. Making couples who want a celebrant-led ceremony have two events as stated above, which is more expensive for them in terms of travel costs etc. It is also more difficult to arrange and decide who should attend. Couples really do not like this system and just want one event.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1. Register office weddings will still be available under these proposals. Some couples will of course just want the 'statutory only' type of ceremony. A cost saving will be made by only using one officiant and, in theory, registrars will be more readily available to conduct weddings, as only one will be required.

Moving away from 'approved venues', means that the deregulated marriage rooms offered by local authorities will more subject to market forces as these local authority owned ex-marriage rooms will have to compete in the wedding venue market as any other room for hire.

2. This will lead to really significant cost savings for couples. Many couples will choose a private home or outdoor location for their wedding. They will no longer have to go around the list of local approved venues and pick one! They will be able to decide what really works for them. This will be a huge benefit.

3. Without the need to travel to have a separate legal ceremony or have registrars attend a venue just to do the legal formalities, couples will experience large cost savings, the opportunity to have the wedding they want, when and where they want it and delivered by the person they want to deliver it! The flexibility provided by removing the need for a separate legal wedding is very significant indeed.

Consultation Question 87:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

1. The current law on marriage is expensive for couples as approved venues are costly. Venue costs are such a large part of overall wedding costs that it prevents couples going ahead with marriages as they just cannot afford it. The smaller, cheaper venues cannot afford local authority fees so do not become 'approved'.

2. Two registrars attending a wedding at a weekend is costly, but many couples believe they have no other choice. Registrar availability is limited, and dates need to be booked often years in advance to ensure a couple can have the time and date they require.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

1. For venues to host weddings without lengthy and complicated pre-approval processes is a MUCH preferred system for couples, for all venues and for the wedding industry as a whole.

The flexibility this will provide is just what is required and it will make currently unavailable locations readily available and will create far greater choice for couples. A scheme that benefits everyone.

2. Registration officers should become more available to conduct weddings as there will only be one registrar required.

3. This will have a huge impact for couples and the wedding industry as a whole. In particular, independent celebrants work alongside couples in professional, creative and flexible ways. By allowing freedom of location, couples will truly be able to have the wedding that they want to have, where they want it, not just what they can have under the current restrictions.

4. Undoubtedly the wedding industry, with venues alone thought to be worth currently £5 billion p.a. (upwards of 1/3 of the value of the £15 billion wedding industry p.a.) will grow rapidly in terms of number of venues hosting weddings if these proposals are implemented. This will generate huge growth in business opportunities which will positively affect the economy as a whole.

Consultation Question 88:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

The current law allows local authorities to charge high fees for hiring decommissioned marriage rooms and for registrars attending approved venues to conduct marriages.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

Whilst fees from approved venues may be less, local authorities will be able to offer a less restricted service themselves. They will be able to conduct weddings in other locations including outdoors and be a more attractive choice to couples who may choose to use their service, without being compelled to do so.

Additionally, there are other elements of these proposals, such as the organising of a pre-approved location listing where new income can be received.

If only one registrar is required to conduct each ceremony then they will be able to conduct more ceremonies, thus potentially increasing revenue for the local authority.

Consultation Question 89:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1. The current law continues to drive couples away from England and Wales to other countries to marry, not least to Scotland. For all the reasons set out in this document, marrying in England and Wales is not an easy process and does not give couples the choice they currently demand.
2. Current law in England and Wales is not inviting to couples. They cannot currently get married how they wish, in places they wish, or by who they wish and are too restricted in all respects.

The current residency laws also put off a lot of couples.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1. Freeing up who can conduct marriages, the locations they can be held and establishing simpler preliminaries will greatly reduce the number of couples travelling elsewhere to marry.
2. The attractiveness of England and Wales as a wedding destination under these proposals will escalate hugely. It will become easier to marry here and have the type of wedding required in any location.

Consultation Question 90:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

Currently couples are prevented from being legally married on UK registered ships if they are in international waters. This reduces this market sector considerably and does not therefore attract ships to be registered in the UK.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

The effect on the maritime industry and ships being registered in the UK can only be positive in all respects if these proposals are implemented

Consultation Question 91:

Please share your views below:

1. The Office of the Registrar General will incur administrative costs in setting up a system for authorising nominated officiants. However, fees charged should more than cover this.

Local authorities will save by only using one registrar to conduct a marriage as this will be more cost effective for them. They will lose the approved venue fees but will be able to charge for setting up the pre-authorised venues listing and have more opportunity to promote their wedding services in wider locations.

2. All businesses in the wedding industry will benefit from these proposals as they give greater flexibility of venue and will attract more couples from overseas to marry here. New businesses will be encouraged to set up and the economy will benefit as a result.

3. It is certainly the case that 'proper' non-religious belief organisations will benefit from these proposals as, if implemented, their members will be able to have the ceremony they wish.

4. Independent celebrants are a growing market sector of mainly self-employed small businesses. A conservative estimate of turnover on weddings (£46 million p.a.) means there are 3700 celebrants conducting approx 25 ceremonies p.a. @ £500 per). This will increase if these proposals are accepted. Celebrants who become authorised officiants will undoubtedly grow their businesses. Demand already exists from couples for celebrant-led ceremonies, reflecting how many there are now practicing.

The volume of ceremonies conducted by celebrants will increase, again conservatively estimated as 40% in the first full year. This will improve the financial situation of hundreds of small businesses in England and Wales.

5. Couples are the people who benefit financially more than anyone if these proposals are implemented as they would then be able to have the wedding they want with the person they want leading it and for a cost that they determine and realistically afford.

They will save money by not having to use approved venues, many will use private homes and outside locations and the cost saving will be huge for them in just location costs. They will not have to pay for two registrars to attend their ceremony or have two ceremonies at different locations. They will benefit hugely!

Chapter 5: Officiants

Please expand on your answer:

Whilst some churches have their own registration officers (for example, the minister of the church or a deacon), some churches do not and are reliant on the local civil registrar to attend, as they do not have their own authorised person (often because weddings are held infrequently). By changing the law to allow registration officers only to officiate at civil weddings, it effectively removes the ability of small churches and other religious settings to hold weddings. One of the Law Commission's stated goals in seeking this consultation is that "the ceremony that is meaningful to the couple should be recognised by law" - for practising Christians and other people of various faiths, the most 'meaningful' wedding possible is one celebrated before God in the presence of their congregation.

This change would have directly impacted my church at the time that I got married, since it is small, independent and holds weddings infrequently.

Whilst this initially sounds reasonable, unfortunately there is a risk that this could be manipulated by current or future governments or litigators to impede the religious freedoms of churches and other communities of faith that adhere to traditional teachings in accordance with their holy scriptures. The 'test' should focus on objective criteria - such as restricting organisations that actively promote terrorism or advocate the violent overthrowing of democracy. Vague references to 'morality' invite the possibility of ill-defined criteria and modern whims being allowed to disrupt, restrict or overrule the operations of religious adherents. For example, would a small Christian church that adheres to the teachings in the Bible that same-sex marriage is not 'marriage' - that marriage is strictly between one man and one woman - be classified as behaving "immorally" by future litigants?

At present, there is no "market" for authorised persons to conduct/register marriages. This proposal would create such a market, which would serve to degrade the institution of marriage. Independent officiants can currently conduct weddings that are not legally binding. These have included ceremonies underwater, in a sadomasochism dungeon, at a comic book convention with a couple dressed as fictional characters, and at a ruined leper hospital on Hallowe'en. Another involved a couple dressed as hedgehogs. Such ceremonies could be legally binding if independent officiants were allowed, undermining the dignity of marriage. Further, it creates financial incentives for 'independent officiants' to push whatever the defined boundaries of legality are in order to satisfy the whims of potential 'customers.'

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

'Prescribed words' serve as a safeguard to ensure that couples enter into marriage freely. Commitment to marriage is serious business, and the common language across the land in the form of prescribed words helps to maintain the legal, formal, nature of the act of marriage. Prescribed words form only a very small part of the wedding ceremony; there is already plenty of scope for other personal/customised words or acts to be incorporated into couples' wedding ceremony and wedding day. There is no need to remove prescribed words and in doing so, there is serious risk that marriage would be diminished within society; 'marriage' as a status could move toward, effectively, being nothing more than a certificate issued by the government. Further, in instances where the celebrant was not known to the couple being married, there is an enhanced risk of one or both parties to the marriage marrying under duress, since there would be reduced opportunity for them to express their objection.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A requirement for officiants to ensure that the ceremony does not undermine the dignity and solemnity of marriage is too subjective. It will not prevent couples finding an officiant to agree to even the most outlandish wishes. There is already significant scope for wedding ceremonies to be personalised to the couple's desires.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A wedding is not a 'private' event in that it is a public declaration of the joining of one man and one woman to be a union that benefits all of society. Maintaining the possibility of a 'public' presence at the wedding ceremony helps to protect vulnerable persons from the horrors of 'sham' or 'forced' marriage, or other malpractice such as bigamy.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Whilst there could be clear benefits for people of faith (many churches do not own their own building and operate in rented premises or venues hired by the hour). However, it is unclear in the wording of the proposal what safeguards will prevent unsuitable venues being used. How will the dignity of such ceremonies be guaranteed? The consultation states that venues would need to be 'dignified' and 'safe', but lacks precision on what this means or how it will be tested. Venues must not detract from the solemn occasion of the wedding. The Law Commission has made it clear it does not object to 'airborne' weddings, which makes it difficult to see how suitable definitions of 'dignified' or 'safe' are proposed - they could be interpreted very broadly indeed, to the point of being unfit for purpose. Unofficial weddings have been conducted underwater, in a sadomasochism dungeon, at a comic book convention with a couple dressed as fictional characters, and at a ruined leper hospital on Hallowe'en. Such settings clearly trivialise marriage. The law must not allow such venues to host legally binding ceremonies.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

While I appreciate the concern, in line with the response above, there is a danger that such a policy could become a means for penalising moral views that contradict prevailing and/or shifting popular opinion. Popular culture is increasingly at odds with faithful biblical teaching on marriage, sexual ethics and identity. A concern for purposes 'contrary to public policy or morality' is too subjective. Unpopular but entirely legal views could mean that some organisations are excluded from nominating officiants. More objective criteria need to be identified, such as promoting purposes that are illegal or support illegal activity (such as terrorism), that advocate the violent overthrow of democracy, or that undermine the rule of law.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This seems to undermine the dignity and solemnity of marriage. It allows for a wedding ceremony to be as meaningful or meaningless as anyone might wish. Meaningful vows provide for a substantial covenant in—using any or no words denies this substance and compromises the commitment which helps to make marriage what it is. Prescribed words assist in establishing and framing the significant legal and personal elements of the ceremony in a formal way, in a properly public way, and there is already a great deal of flexibility around those prescriptions which allow for personal preference to be expressed. The prescribed words are brief; any genuine wedding should be able to incorporate them. Marriage is not solely a private agreement, but a public and civil engagement, and the legal element of prescribed words helps to communicate that.

Please expand on your answer:

I appreciate the value of expanding the range of venues, but question how opening it up completely will help to ensure that the dignity and solemnity and perhaps even credibility and validity of marriage will be preserved in wedding ceremonies that can happen literally anywhere. More precise language might be needed to ensure that venues are fit and proper places for such an event.

Please share your views below:

I think that outdoor weddings can be valid, and private homes may on occasion be helpful or necessary venues, but some of these provisions—unless specified carefully—could lead to frivolous or insubstantial ceremonies, in which the dignity and solemnity of the vows being made is undermined or lost in the event itself.

The majority of couples have been very accepting of the restrictions put in place, if they have gone ahead with the ceremony.

Although most couples have postponed their ceremonies until the restrictions are lifted.

However a couple of venues have pushed back on the restrictions and one have held receptions for more than the restrictions allow on a regular basis.

One venue disagreed about our request to change the ceremony room around in order to provide better ventilation for ourselves and to prevent us from walking through the guests, however the venue did agree after a few discussions and ceremonies have continued within the rules of the restrictions.

I think this could be a waste of time, if an official leaves the registration service, or is sick on the day, or their car breaks down on the way to the venue, this is just making the process more difficult.

Most couples accept that they will be married by a registrar, and don't even consider what their name is.

In the ceremony we are required to announce our names and where we are from.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Its a difficult one, we normally know who the priest or vicar of a church is, but how would we know who was officiating, and if they are adequately trained in all the correct declarations and contracting words that need to be spoken

Consultation Question 24:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

For every non-religious organisation, I think there would need to be a register of organisations and officiants, but that could continue to change, possibly quickly become out of date and would cause so many headaches in proving that someone has been trained in order to officiate at a wedding

Please share your views below:

The list could be endless, non-religious groups that spring to mind are groups like pagans etc., however what about devil worship groups, star trek groups, where is the line drawn, in today's culture of claiming discrimination you could end up in very deep water

Consultation Question 25:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Again I think you could be muddying the waters and have any group of 20 or more trying to hold wedding ceremonies.

At the moment ceremonies are carried out in churches or religious places of worship, or in approved venues, non religious groups meet anywhere, so where would these ceremonies be held?

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Again a difficult one, Star Trek groups are not contrary to public policy or morality, but would could they be considered to be giving the marriage ceremony the dignity it requires, who would oversee this.

Again I believe you could be opening a can of worms re groups claiming discrimination, as you can't prove that God exists, you can't say that the devil doesn't exist and therefore can't discriminate against devil worshipping groups if they don't conduct themselves unlawfully.
What about Hell's Angels communities, traveller camps etc....

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

I think they would have to, but again how quickly would this register become out of date, who you chase to update it.
At the moment registrars are council employees, not just a member of a group and members of the clergy are ordained, so have a commitment to the role, members of groups are transient, which would make this list very quickly not worth the paper it's written on

Consultation Question 28:

No

Please expand on your answer:

So on one hand you wish for anyone to be able to conduct weddings, ie impacting on the revenue the registration service can make, but on the other we the registration service have to be responsible for this list, for probably no recompense, a list which could be for ever changing.
How many groups do you believe could be on these lists, would we need to check every marriage and officiant against the list? What if the officiant named on the list was not available on the day, policing this would be a nightmare.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

As per my comments above

Consultation Question 30:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Who checks these people out, registrars trained, and not allowed to officiate until able to prove that they are ready to officiate. They have references taken as a council employee and are continually assessed, and are answerable to the council and general register office if in breach of any rules, how would these nominated people be assessed and brought to task if they don't follow the rules?

Consultation Question 31:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Again, how are they assessed, they may only officiate on one or two weddings a year, and therefore forget major parts of the service/registration process

Consultation Question 32:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

My belief's don't come into my job, but I am allowed to earn from conducting ceremonies therefore the council makes a business out of providing the service. How would you stop agencies from doing the same by providing officiants, a president has already been set by the council so I believe you would have difficulty in stopping others.

Consultation Question 33:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

To some extent, prices increase yearly, churches increase their prices, independent officials should be able to do the same, and if people wish to pay more for a particular one then so be it

Consultation Question 34:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

If they don't who would?

Consultation Question 36:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Guidance is not enough. A wedding is a verbal contract, there are specific words that need to be said by both parts of the couple, it is not guidance it is law.

But I ask again, who assesses if these officiants are always conducting the ceremonies correctly?

Consultation Question 37:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If the officiants are only given guidance, how would any member of the organisation know if they were not conducting the ceremonies correctly

Consultation Question 38:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

But if a ceremony is found to be conducted incorrectly, is it still valid, who decides.

At present, having two registrars attending the ceremonies, one ensures the other is conducting correctly so this eventuality doesn't happen

Consultation Question 39:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I agree that it needs to be overseen, but not sure we have the capacity to keep the list up to date and in order, without employing further staff. If we are still conducting weddings, how do we also attend the ceremonies to oversee and ensure compliance without further staff

Consultation Question 40:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 41:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Again, I believe that this list, and the compliance issues surrounding it would be a nightmare to police

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

So are you saying that a couple could be married by just signing a piece of paper, without a verbal ceremony?

The marriage ceremony has been used unchanged for many a year, its a tradition of this country, why does it need to be changed.

Would this remove the need for witness?

This gives raise to more questions than answers

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Again, too many changes, each wedding would therefore be different, which can be done now, whilst still keeping the declaratory and contracting words. The proposed way would need the officiant to be aware of how each couple are proceeding which would lead to more paperwork

Consultation Question 44:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If I am reading this correct, does this mean that a couple of Catholics could have a Jewish ceremony, why complicate the matter?
If that was the case, who would officiate the ceremony, I can't see a Jewish rabbi wanting to conduct a non Jewish couples marriage, and I can't see them being happy for them to hold it in a synagogue either

Consultation Question 45:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is a difficult one, couples who are not allowed to marry in churches etc.. due to the rules of the clergy, might want to incorporate a prayer or reading from the bible into a civil ceremony, however, where do we draw the line in order to keep it identifiable as a civil ceremony?
I also feel that the clergy might object to this, as they may end up losing business.

Please share your views below:

If we allow prayers and text reading from the bible it will quickly become a religious ceremony.
What about hymns and singing?
As soon as we allow some content, couples will push the boundaries for more and the registration service could receive more complaints, at the moment we both know where we start and where the church starts, we don't stand on each others toes and the system works

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Not unless the church changes its rules on divorced couples marrying in church, you would be removing an option that couples use, again this would lead to complaints

Consultation Question 47:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

It is a very rare for a ceremony to be stopped due to a member of the public having a legal objection.
But it is an old English tradition one which I would not like to see removed, this is however a personal opinion

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The sanctity of marriage needs to be protected there are various places where to hold a ceremony would not uphold this basic feature.

Please share your views below:

Outdoors, getting an official to attend at the top of a mountain for instance could be problematic
I have no objection to on lakes or rivers, as long as safety is taken into consideration
In the air, again finding an officiant to go up in a hot air balloon, or onto a private jet could be problematic
Private homes, need consideration, is a caravan considered to be a private home? If the changes are made and you work alone, safety needs to be a major consideration, especially in certain situations

Consultation Question 49:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Again as stated above, the ability for someone to stop an illegal wedding is an English tradition, however if the government approves some of these measures removing the public part of the ceremony will open up more places to marry which is maybe what some couples are looking for. Again, we need to ensure the sanctity of marriage is upheld in the consideration of 'anywhere'

Consultation Question 50:

Yes

Yes

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

I think it would just cloud the issue, I can't see many non religious couples wanting a religious setting, other than for aesthetic purposes, but that is where the clergy would probably object, so who would officiate?

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If the locations are opened up, how would the officiant be knowledgeable on all the locations, would the officiant be expected to visit the location beforehand?

If this was the case and they declined a person's home how would that be communicated and by whom, this could lead to unpleasant face to face confrontations with possible unfortunate risks

Consultation Question 52:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Again, if the locations are opened up, without a prior visit to the proposed location how would the officiant know, and if it is not a safe and dignified place who tells the couple?

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Guidance needs to be given, but sometimes its a feeling not a ticking box exercise.

The address may hide the kind of location, and until you arrive you are unaware of what you are walking into.

A wedding should be a celebration, and I can't see that the official would be met by trouble, but we have procedures to follow and if we weren't prepared to allow the ceremony to go ahead for any reason our safety needs to be a priority

Consultation Question 53:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

That could work

Please share your views below:

The local registration office for that district should be able to access regularly used locations and approve their licence to marry

Chapter 8: Registration

Consultation Question 54:

No

Please expand on your answer:

These should be on the paperwork before it is signed, otherwise any information could be added, which could be false or incorrect

Consultation Question 55:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I don't believe that marriages should only be registered in Welsh, English yes and English and Welsh but not solely in Welsh

Consultation Question 56:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Electronic registration already exists, we key all civil marriages on to the system now.

If you are talking about electronic registration at the time of the ceremony, and the ability to print the certificate of marriage at the ceremony, then that will give cause to all sorts of IT issues, along with wifi issues and printing problems, which would add to the officiants duties, and if any problems were encountered it would make us look unprofessional

Chapter 10: Validity and offences

Consultation Question 57:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Proof of number of 3 maybe difficult to obtain if the proposals go through, as the list could be ever changing

No

Please expand on your answer:

If you are removing the declaration, and or witnesses, and or the confirmation that you are legally free to marry and then don't sign the marriage document, how can it be considered legal

Consultation Question 58:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

How long passes before you can no longer claim that the ceremony fell into the category of a non-qualifying ceremony?

Marriage as it stands at present requires the officiant to check the notice of marriage with each party before the ceremony, are you suggesting that this is also removed and if so why, checking that each party has completed the notice of marriage enables us to confirm the parties details, if one notice of marriage was missing the ceremony would not go ahead.

Proving b i could be difficult in a court of law, remember these are people you are dealing with and the question of their marriage being legal could result in pain to all parties including any children born within the marriage

Consultation Question 59:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

We can't make couples live together now after a ceremony, nothing changes in this respect

Other

Please expand on your answer:

You can't abolish a presumption.

Whether, the couple cohabit for a long period or if friends and family believe they are married is not the issue.

Common law does not make a partner a legal spouse, marriage does, there are reasons that couples marry and there are reasons that couples don't, to say that if you live with someone for 10 years then you are married is false, if they then spilt up do they have to get divorced even though they have never married?

Consultation Question 60:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 61:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

If this is implemented, then yes it should be an offence

Chapter 11: Special types of wedding

Consultation Question 62:

Please share your views below:

I don't believe the current requirements lead to any problems, maybe the couples concerned would be better asked

Consultation Question 63:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Even though one of the parties may have a terminal illness, the marriage still needs to be legal, conducting an illegal ceremony will only lead to issues, possibly after the death of the party

Consultation Question 64:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I think that the involvement of the Register General is a good thing, they are used to dealing with these issues and react quickly and professionally

Consultation Question 65:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

As long as they are not applying for a special licence, they can be married like any other couple

Consultation Question 66:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

If they are unable to get married within the twelve months, then they should have to give a further notice like any other couple

Consultation Question 67:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This would be in such extreme circumstances that I can't see it ever being used.
Also, if everything is done remotely, the ability to abuse the system would be increased.

No

Please expand on your answer:

See above

No

Please expand on your answer:

There are charities out there who can provide the wedding free of charge for terminally ill couples, if no evidence was required this would be open to abuse.

Consultation Question 68:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

As long as we are in our territorial waters, I can't see an issue.

Consultation Question 69:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Whilst I agree that getting married on a cruise ship holds nice ideals, on whose list would the officiant be on, if the staff continually changes on each ship how would we know if the correct official is on the correct ship.

Providing an official from the registration service would be a near impossibility

Consultation Question 70:

Please share your views below:

I refer to my previous answer regarding list of the official, and staff changes.

Providing an official to a submarine could be difficult, due to the confined space.

Other vessels could raise to sea sickness etc..

Consultation Question 71:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

So, how can the registration service ensure that the correct official has been used before the ceremony commences

Consultation Question 72:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Again, how can we police this, if the named official is unwell, and unable to conduct, how do we know that someone hasn't stepped in and signed the correct officials name?

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Of course

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

But, what a mess we would be creating for the couple, and again the legal mess of are we married or not could have serious complications if children have been brought into the marriage

Consultation Question 73:

Please share your views below:

Non religious ceremonies would be better, if the couple is highly religious then they should not be considering the option of a wedding on a ship

Consultation Question 74:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

So we could be waiting for the marriage schedule for months, what if its lost is the marriage still valid?

It is not unusual for the couple to lose the marriage certificate on the day of the wedding, but because we have all the legal documents and the entry into the register they can obtain a copy without issue.

Chapter 12: Fees

Consultation Question 75:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Although at present risk assessments are required due to covid, if we are to enter homes, would we/them have to be able to prove that the vaccine had been administered before attending?

Consultation Question 76:

(2) a separate fee from other forms of giving notice, set nationally on compassionate grounds at below cost level.

Please expand on your answer:

But I still believe that evidence of terminal illness should be given in order to use this compassionate fee

Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

1) I don't believe it discourages couples from marrying, I have no evidence for this belief, however after working in the registration service for 18 months, ceremonies are constantly being booked, we don't have many quiet weeks in relation to marriages.

2) I don't think any changes would increase the rate of marriages, the present system is not a hard one to follow, does not discriminate and is available for all.

Couples marry for many reasons, and couples don't marry for many reasons, I don't believe changes in the way marriages are conducted will change how couples think

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1) I think the current costs and availability of register office weddings is fair, we don't turn people away who wish to marry in this way

2&3) It is possible to have a wedding without incurring large costs, however if you choose to use an approved premise or a registered place of worship, then your costs will be more, the use of the building increases the cost and having a registrar attend a venue costs more, but it comes down to individual choice which is a good thing.

4&5) Again this comes down to personal choice, in both cases you would need to hold a legal ceremony normally at a register office and then use the desired location or a celebrant in order to complete your celebrations, which adds to the costs of the day, but if people want to do this you have to allow them the option.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1) Register office weddings wouldn't change so I don't believe that there would be any savings there.

2) Locations and venues would still charge for the use of the building, apart from in private homes, I don't see many savings, as if the event was being held in a private home I can't see many of these just being the couple and their witnesses in the living room. If someone owns a large private home suitable for a wedding ceremony, they would be hiring in officials, venue decorators, caterers, cleaners etc... the cost of a wedding is not just about the legal side of getting married, there are very few lost cost 2 plus 2 weddings as we call them as most people want a day to remember

3) As soon as you start having two ceremonies one legal and one ceremonial, then costs increase, so again I can't see any savings.

Consultation Question 87:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

1) venues pay for their license which allows them to hold ceremonies for 3 years, they don't have to have this license in order to hold wedding breakfasts and evening receptions, however if they wish to be able to provide the whole day experience for the couple many do. They increase the cost of the package for the couple if they do hold the ceremony with the venue, so not sure how they have missed opportunities. Depending, on how big the venue is depends on how many weddings they can hold in one day, small smaller ones can only hold one others can hold 3 or 4, so again unsure on how current laws impact on their opportunities.

2) The registration service never turns anyone away, they will bring in officers from other areas if they are struggling to fulfil their diary, and may have to offer a different time to the one the couple first requests, but it is very rare that couples can't have the day they require due to lack of officials. The costs of officials attending are no concern to the venues, as these costs are settled by the couple directly with the register office

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it. We would also welcome any data on the size of businesses that are affected by the law or will be impacted under our proposed reforms. :

The current system is not preventative so I can't see how changing the process of getting married will change the number of people getting married. I don't have the evidence you require, apart from talking to people who are getting married, and they don't think about the process and who and where when they agree to getting married, most couples start with the register office, the process and fees for our services are explained and then they start looking at churches or venues.

Being an ex owner of a wedding venue, I never saw a couple who really wanted to get married in a hot air balloon, or any where without a license, but were settling for what they could have due to the current process.

Consultation Question 88:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

Local authorities staff the register office, which also deals with births and deaths and recruit as and when is required.

As previously stated no couple is turned away, times may need to be changed, but on the whole if a couple want to get married on a particular day, then we do our best to ensure that that happens, even if it means bringing in staff from other offices.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

I can see the management of the list of approved officials being a complete nightmare, if this is extended to groups, when members change, when the official doesn't wish to do it any more, what happens when the named official is unable to conduct on the day for any number of reasons, does the marriage go ahead, does someone step in and then the ceremony is not valid, there are so many pitfalls to this suggestion that I believe more bad than good would come of it.

Whose responsibility is the training and continual assessment of these officiants, if this falls on the local authority, again this would be a massive undertaking.

Visiting private homes, or other locations in order to see if they are safe and fitting for the occasion, would also increase the workload.

The costs of the increased workload would need to be met, but by whom?

Consultation Question 89:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

1) At present residents of England and Wales can travel within England and Wales to get married without issue, I don't believe this has any impact on the couples.

2) If an overseas resident wishes to marry in England or Wales they just need to provide the correct paperwork to us in order for the marriage to go ahead, again I don't believe this causes issues within the couples

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

As this is a very long survey, I can't remember seeing anything about changing the law on overseas residents getting married in England and Wales, please accept my apologies if this has been discussed.

We still need paperwork if overseas residents are getting married in England and Wales, I don't think this should be overlooked or changed.

Consultation Question 90:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

I don't have enough knowledge of this to comment

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

Again, I don't have enough knowledge of the law and how the proposed changes would affect it to comment

Consultation Question 91:

Please share your views below:

1) Thoughts on additional work costs need to be considered, as a lot of paperwork could be put on the local authorities, which would need to be recompensed

2) Can't see much impact

3) Religious probably no change, non-religious, the cost of adding or changing officiants may be incurred, but they would need to accept this if it applied.

4) Independent officials would pass on their costs plus more to the couple, so the only people apart from the local authorities who would be affected by higher costs are the couples

Consultation Question 7:

Please share your views below:

No.

It is important for all interviews to be in-person, so that interviewers can check all couples for issues around sham/forced weddings. This would be very difficult online.

If only some couples are asked to come in-person:

- This gives away to the couple that there are concerns, which gives them a chance to prepare to hide coercion, etc.
- This risks claims of racial/religious discrimination if some groups are called for in-person meetings more frequently (which may be valid, due to different cultural expectations around marriage and women's rights).

For couples who are having a 'real' marriage to come for an in-person interview is a minor inconvenience against a lifetime marriage, and a minor inconvenience to protect those who may be at risk.

Publishing the banns is a good opportunity for the church family to remember and pray for the couple, particularly in situations where the couple are students (e.g. marrying straight after graduation), and they are often absent from their 'parish' churches.

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

No; many smaller churches do not frequently hold weddings, and may lack an authorised person, or be less familiar with the legal requirements.

This clause should also make reference to morals / ethics rising from their beliefs.

Please share your views below:

Yes; this would help separate 'serious' non-religious belief groups from other non-religious groups.

Organisations which do not amount to a non-religious belief organisation would include:

- Rights groups (e.g. unions, racial / sexual / gender – based rights groups)
- Political or advocacy groups
- Groups such as vegans who have strong beliefs, but these beliefs are not incompatible with other beliefs such as religious beliefs

Consultation Question 25:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

20 seems low; whilst there are small churches, these would normally be part of a larger grouping (e.g. CoE, methodists, etc), so a requirement of say 50 or 20 + membership of a denomination/grouping of at least 500?

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

No, this clause is very vague, and could be easily used against religious or other groups who hold e.g. traditional views on marriage, or believe in sharia law.

Even if the government has no plans to use such a clause in this way, there are other groups (such as secular groups) who might seek to use such a clause against religious groups.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

No; named individuals is important, so that individuals are vetted.

A rule based on office alone is also open to abuse as there is nothing to control how organisations appoint people to offices within their system.

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There should be no independent officiants.

Registrars and religious representatives who are authorised to conduct marriages are trained and likely to have strong views on the dignity and seriousness of marriage and the vows.

Independent officiants are likely to be part of the 'wedding industry', providing 'fun' ceremonies which do not take seriously the commitment of marriage. They would be paid, and this would mean that the wedding ceremony itself is also commercialised, which would increase costs for couples, and encourage Independent officiants to concoct increasingly wacky ceremonies to attract clients.

There is also a risk that Independent officiants may be used where a couple have been refused a ceremony by a religious group (e.g. if their belief or behaviour do not fit the religion). In contrast to a civil ceremony, an Independent officiant could misrepresent a religious group with a pseudo-religious ceremony.

See also comments in (29). There should be no independent officiants.

Officiants should not receive any monetary compensation for officiating, though a small gift (flowers, etc) would be fine.

Even if the option to use a registrar remains, this would inevitably lead to increased costs for weddings for many couples.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The proscribed words are the foundation of the declarations for a marriage. Without these, a wedding is potentially meaningless, and a legal marriage is simply a piece of paper.

Marriage is founded on a solemn and serious covenant between two parties. These proposals would remove the requirement for these promises. These vows must be taken seriously, and without the proscribed words, it would be easy to treat the ceremony casually.

The rest of the ceremony is already very flexible. There is no need to add additional flexibility by removing these words, and it is hard to imagine a serious ceremony in which these words cannot be included.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A legal wedding ceremony is a serious commitment, and not a fun, personalised experience. The rest of the ceremony and day provides plenty of scope for fun, personalised experience. Additional non-binding ceremonies can already be included.

This also makes it easy for couples to culturally misappropriate elements from other faith ceremonies.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is a public commitment, and the open doors requirement is important to this. This requirement also helps protect against forced marriage.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Where a religious group does not own a venue (but e.g. uses a community centre or school, etc), these should be allowed as venues provided they are:

- regularly using this meeting place for public meetings
- the meeting place is not a private home

Otherwise, the removal of the requirement to register buildings risks any venue being used, which is very unlikely to ensure the seriousness of the ceremony & commitments are upheld.

outdoors,, on inland waters such as lakes or rivers,, in the air, and/or, in private homes.

Please share your views below:

None of these venues should be permitted.

It is impossible for ceremonies on the water, in the air, or in private homes to maintain effective open doors.
Outdoor ceremonies in the gardens of registered venues could be permitted, but not other outdoor locations.

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

Much of the proposals seek to make weddings more 'personalised', which, in practice, means expensive. This will increase costs, and thus reduce the number of couples getting married.

Even if cheap options remain, an increased expectation puts pressure on couples to spend more money.

Many churches do not have their own authorised person to register weddings and therefore need the support of a civil registrar familiar with the necessary legalities. This might be for good reason such as that the church holds weddings infrequently, or the church is small in numbers, or the church does not have a minister. A separate civil ceremony would then be needed in these circumstances.

Popular cultural ideas portrayed in the media and even reflected in today's highly secular UK government fluctuate and change over time and might seek to penalise the teaching of the World's religions that are much more stable and do not tend to change over time. The assessment in question of "contrary to public policy or morality" is just too subjective, uncertain and unpredictable. It would risk those with less popular but entirely legal views being excluded from nominating officiants. The focus ought to be on illegal activity such as those of terrorists who advocate the violent overthrow of democracy.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Currently wedding officials are either highly trained registrars or religious representatives who are likely to hold a strongly-held view of marriage. An independent person appointed whereby there is lack of clarity on what safeguards or training would be in place prior to appointing an independent, to carry the responsibility needed. Having an independent conducting a pseudo-religious ceremony could misrepresent the religious group's position or perhaps there might be beliefs from more than one religion brought to a single ceremony, distorting the practice and principles being represented by the faiths involved. An independent opens up a market for wedding vows to be a commercial concern and would open doors to a low, degrading view of marriage, and a weakened one at that.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

As per The Marriage Act of 1949, the prescribed words essentially form a foundation for the declaration needed - without them a marriage is not founded on solemn and sober promises. A legally recognised marriage with no words let alone no promises markedly reduces the commitment needed and the ceremony becomes overtly casual. The rules are already very flexible on the rest of the ceremony. It is very important to note and acknowledge that marriage is not and has never been an entirely private affair, marriage and divorce impact widely on society as a whole. The wedding is a public declaration with accountability needed primarily to the person to whom you are marrying, however there is also an inherent accountability beyond the couple too.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The seriousness and sincerity and fidelity of the commitment needed for marriage is much more important than going to huge lengths to personalise / customise every detail to the couple's preferences, as this encourages commercialisation and a sense of 'buying an event'.

The Law Commission seem to offer therefore a very broad interpretation, open wide, as to places that they would regard as "dignified" and "safe". Surely that cannot be the case for everywhere and anywhere.

Consultation Question 19:

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is extremely helpful for Civil Registrars to register weddings at churches, which do not have an authorised person, due to the fact that some churches may not have a wedding very often, or could be small and not familiar with the legal requirement. In order for a wedding ceremony to be recognised in law, it is vital for a Civil Registrar to be present, otherwise it could lead to a couple needing a civil ceremony also.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

The term 'contrary to public policy or morality,' is extremely wide in its potential interpretation. A group could be eliminated from nominating an Officiant, because it may hold unpopular, yet totally legal views. The criteria should be more specific, i.e. barring those who are specifically undermining the law through illegal activities.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

At the present time, wedding Officiants are either professional registrars or those of religious association, who take a serious view of their function. Ceremonies, which are not currently legally binding, undertaken by Officiants, tend to be of a lighter nature sometimes bordering on the bizarre. If independent Officiants were allowed to take legally binding ceremonies, it would no doubt erode the serious nature and dignity of the occasion. Introducing Independent Officiants, could also open up a commercial market, in which Officiants who are prepared to cater for the bizarre and extreme, would demand the highest fees. Currently, conducting wedding ceremonies, does not pander to the financially greedy. Furthermore, it must be borne in mind that in 2018, the Government gave the Law Commission a mandate to move towards the reduction in costs of wedding venues.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is an extremely serious undertaking, the full impact of which , is only realised upon entering married life. Therefore, it is vital to maintain prescribed words, in order to emphasise the seriousness of this life changing occasion. Marriage is far more than a simple route to obtain a marriage certificate. A couple are quite free to choose whatever other elements they wish to include.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

In view of the fact that the Law Commission holds to the conviction that Officiants should have a duty to uphold the dignity and solemnity of marriage ,this proposal could seriously undermine this objective. The proposal should remain in the realm of non legally binding ceremonies.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It should not be possible for someone to get married without being present at the wedding ceremony. Simply signing the marriage schedule is inadequate.

Need to keep public declarations that are considered foundational to the legal marriage ceremony. This risks undermining the solemnity of the wedding ceremony and denying seriousness of commitment being made.

There is already a large amount of flexibility in the wedding ceremony. The prescribed words are minimal and couples can add to them in all sorts of ways. It is not much to ask that some specific phrases are used to show that both people freely consent to lifetime commitment they are entering into.

A wedding is not just about the couple. The couple enter into a union which is understood by society and has been legally defined. So society and the law have an interest in the making of a public declaration.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A marriage ceremony is a serious and solemn event. The idea that a couple should be able to choose everything about a wedding ceremony comes from a wrong view of marriage. A wedding is a public declaration in which society and the state have an interest.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The 'open doors' requirement helps convey the public nature of wedding declarations. This was introduced hundreds of years ago as a protection against forced marriages. This is still a problem in our society.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

The seriousness and solemnity of a marriage ceremony means that should be appropriate places to hold such a significant ceremony. Would weddings be allowed in such places as MacDonalds?

Notice should identify the officiant to ensure he/she is officially authorised as otherwise the marriage could be challenged as illegal

Consultation Question 12:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Provided that the substitute is officially authorised

Please share your views below:

Question too vague. What other circumstances are envisaged?

Consultation Question 13:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Publication of banns in home areas of both parties and in the location of the proposed wedding provides some protection to the parties allowing challenge as the eligibility of either party to marry.

This also appears to be a direct attack on the Anglican church.

Consultation Question 14:

No

Please expand on your answer:

May not currently be very significant, except that church buildings have been known to be damaged or destroyed by "terrorist" or other attack, even in peacetime, and fire or storm damage can occur at any time. Widen the scope but do not repeal.

This also appears to be a direct attack on the Anglican church.

Consultation Question 15:

Please share your views below:

No. Banns should also be read in the location(s) of both parties.

This also appears to be a direct attack on the Anglican church.

Consultation Question 16:

Please share your views below:

Yes to both points. At least the Anglican Church takes a wedding as the start of a lifelong commitment to a marriage seriously. This quango and the government should not meddle in the affairs of the Anglican or any other church.

Consultation Question 17:

Please share your views below:

Yes, and this should also apply prior to ANY wedding anywhere.

Consultation Question 18:

Anglican preliminaries should continue to be recognised as legal preliminaries to weddings officiated by the Church of England and the Church in Wales;
or

Please expand on your answer:

Leave the churches alone. Also all weddings in any other venues should be preceded by civil preliminaries stressing the meaning and importance of commitment of the parties to a life-long union.

Consultation Question 20:

Consultation Question 25:

Please expand on your answer:

This appears to be the same as the current arrangement of "authorised person" in some non-conformist churches, for example. But nomination should be examined and approved before authorisation.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Yes - if an organisation promotes purposes that are unlawful etc etc it should be prohibited anyway

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

Res, but subject to proper scrutiny and authorisation, not just by nomination.

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

In addition, nominations should be scrutinised thoroughly by the GRO before official authorisation

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is too wide open to abuse

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

But nomination is not sufficient on its own. Nominations should be scrutinised and authorised or rejected by the GRO as set out in my responses above

Consultation Question 31:

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 32:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

If not, system would be open to abuse

Consultation Question 33:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A system of independent officiants is open wide to abuse anyway unless properly regulated. It becomes just a business. The government must ensure proper registration and regulation. There should be a standard and maximum charge specified by law, to avoid abuse of the system

Consultation Question 34:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

If authorised, "independent" should mean independent, and it should be properly regulated as any other business would be.

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

And also stress the commitment to a lifelong union. What constitutes both dignity and solemnity needs clear definition - otherwise individuals are open to define the words to suit their own purposes.

Consultation Question 36:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 37:

No

Please expand on your answer:

That is clearly open to widespread abuse. Those nominating individuals should be responsible for drawing those who fail to the authorising body, the GRO. Whether or not attention to failure comes from the nominating body, Proper regulation should be the responsibility of the GRO. Ultimately, the GRO should have power to remove individuals from the list of authorised persons.

Consultation Question 40:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Authorisation should be time limited and re-application should be required at regular intervals to ensure the list kept up to date.

Consultation Question 41:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

This would be typical of any well regulated organisation.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

1 They should be required to express that there is no impediment to their marrying each other in public in case there may be some challenge not discovered during "the preliminaries" .

2 " Religious organisations and (if enabled by Government to officiate at weddings) non-religious belief organisations MUST submit details of their wedding ceremonies to the General Register Office, to identify the way(s) each party expresses consent in accordance with their beliefs"; - to ensure that these comply with UK law. And they MUST be followed in every case

3 "...the signing of which would itself be an expression of consent if the ceremony did not contain an expression of consent" Do not agree - the ceremony MUST include a public expression of consent.

4 See response to 3 above

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The ceremony MUST include the legally binding form of words in respect of impediment and consent. This proposal could result in the introduction of frivolous items into what should be a serious and legal commitment to marriage. Anything else can be an add-on or left to "the party" afterwards

Please expand on your answer:

Public access should continue to be allowed - doors could be closed, but not locked.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Question 35 states : We provisionally propose that officiants should have a responsibility to uphold the dignity and solemnity of marriage.

"Anywhere" will not necessarily comply with that fine proposal.

Please share your views below:

Outdoors would be a possibility, provided the venue has been properly registered and authorised. It will not be possible to comply with registration of the other proposals, and they will not meet the criteria of free public access which is important. Some of those proposals would open the way to stunts, shows and secret ceremonies in public homes. which would certainly not comply with the stated object in Q 35 " We provisionally propose that officiants should have a responsibility to uphold the dignity and solemnity of marriage."

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Public access should be maintained to allow for challenge which has not been discovered during "the preliminaries"

Consultation Question 50:

No

No

No

Please expand on your answer:

If these possibilities were to become law, it would no doubt give rise to churches or other religious organisations having to open their doors to ceremonies contrary to their faith basis. For example same-sex weddings which are contrary to the beliefs of Christians who base their belief on the Bible.

Civil weddings should not be confused with religious weddings.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Q 35 : We provisionally propose that officiants should have a responsibility to uphold the dignity and solemnity of marriage. Approval of wedding venues should go through an approval and registration process to ensure that they are suitable to meet these criteria. Opening selection of venue to decision of the officiant except from a list of registered venues must be avoided.

Consultation Question 52:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Agree, but should also include registered and approved.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Yes agree, but the GRO should also register venues as suitable and acceptable.

Consultation Question 53:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Approval and registration by the GRO to ensure compliance with standards meeting the dignity and solemnity criteria. No free for all at the whim of officiants who may be in the business of making money out of a civic duty.

Chapter 11: Special types of wedding

Consultation Question 62:

Please share your views below:

I don't know what the current law says, but terminal illness, hospitalisation and housebound cases clearly need special and compassionate consideration. I don't believe that special circumstances should extend to those who are detained in prison.

Consultation Question 66:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Parties who are detailed in prison should be excluded from the list.

Consultation Question 67:

No

Please expand on your answer:

1 I agree that special arrangements may be necessary in a national emergency, but this needs proper definition and should form part of the primary legislation.

2, 3 and 4 I don't agree. It is important that face to face meetings to determine eligibility to marry. Remote ceremonies will not allow for public access, and the possibility of challenge of eligibility. Signatures on separate bits of paper should not be necessary.

2, 3 and 4 throw the whole concept of dignity and solemnity out of the window as well as being an open invitation to abuse.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Define "national emergency". Some (eg Covid 19) may affect all weddings because of travel restrictions. Others (eg war or terrorist activity) will maybe disrupt plans but not prevent a wedding taking place.

No

Please expand on your answer:

The statement is too vague. During a war, for example, both combatants and civilians could be said to be "at risk of death". Clearer definition is required of what is intended. Evidence that a person is seriously ill and unlikely to recover is a clear statement of fact.

Consultation Question 68:

No

Please expand on your answer:

These could only be pandering to the extreme tastes of a relatively few individuals, and the preservation of the dignity and solemnity of a wedding at the start of a lifelong commitment to marriage could be entirely absent. See all my comments about registration of venues in response to earlier questions.

Consultation Question 70:

These proposals are just pandering to the taste of a few without any justification. All of them are becoming far from the principle of dignity and solemnity. They are not worthy of a serious government agency who seem intent on further destruction of what marriage is all about

No

Please expand on your answer:

Delete "member of crew who is an independent officiant".

There may be a very few circumstances where weddings at sea may be acceptable, desirable and necessary. The inclusion of a "resident independent officiant" crew member" would only be necessary if the ship were to become a floating wedding location.

These proposals are just pandering to the taste of a few without any justification. All of them are becoming far from the principle of dignity and solemnity. ## Chapter 13: The potential impact of our proposals

Consultation Question 85:

Please share your views below:

I don't believe that it is the current law which has led to the reduction in legal marriages. Successive Governments have undermined the state of marriage as between one man and one woman by introducing civil partnerships, same sex marriage, and making divorce easier. Co-habitation has become the norm, with promiscuity growing before marriage and after marriage and between marriages. The whole situation is blurred by the way the Equalities Act is applied, and by the encouragement of LGBTQ +++ issues. The idea that a biological man and a biological woman should remain celibate until they are married, and then stay married for 40, 50 60 or more years is seen as archaic. This attitude to marriage has give rise to the huge growth in single parent families, often totally reliant on state "benefit" and complaining about poverty, where frequently the children are ignored, abused, and left to turn to crime. Selfish "me first" attitudes abound.

Successive governments have boasted about support for families, but have done nothing to look at the causes of family breakdown.

Children who are part of stable families with a mother and father generally do better at school and in later life. And such children are likely to be more supportive of elderly parents.

Prominent individuals - wealthy business people, so called celebrities, MPs, Government ministers to name but a few - all set bad examples of what stable married family life should be about.

Consultation Question 86:

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

The soaring cost of "the wedding" is not primarily the fees and costs, legal or otherwise, but the huge costs of planning the day, clothes for the day, huge guest lists and wanting to keep up with the Jones's or do even better. The costs of venues (whether for the whole ceremony plus reception, or just reception after a church or registry wedding) deters many. How much easier just to live together and then after a few months or years decide to split up and try someone else. No commitment. Often children are really hurt in such fleeting relationships.

Please share your views below. If you have any evidence to support your answers, or which might help us assess the extent of possible benefits, please provide it.:

I don't believe these proposals will have any benefit at all in developing more stable marriages. They are all peripheral tinkering with existing law.

Successive Governments have already gone a long way to destroying the concept of stable traditional marriage between a man and a woman, a life-long commitment, freely entered into, with the intention of raising a family, and excluding all other similar but inferior relationships.

The benefits of a stable marriage should be obvious, but are often sidelined as being old fashioned. Going for a simple wedding and committing to each other "for better or worse, richer poorer, in sickness and in health, till parted by death" reaps its rewards. Part of this relationship is working hard, sorting out differences, raising families. This lacks the glamour portrayed in media, TV, film, and sport for example, but is what so many couples of the older generations have done.

Shame on individuals, parliaments and governments for their past failures, and for ignoring objections of the millions of the population who have objected and been dismayed at the destruction to family life which has been caused.

The term “contrary to public policy or morality” is too subjective an assessment. It would risk those with unpopular but entirely legal views being excluded from nominating officiants. The test should focus on objective criteria such as terrorism or that which undermines the rule of law.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is important to maintain the status quo where wedding officiants are either highly trained registrars or religious representatives who are likely to have strongly-held beliefs on marriage.

Allowing independent officiants would open the door to those who may not place such a high value on marriage.

A recent study found that most independent celebrants would give couples very little restriction in what they could include in their ceremony – even where the content “clashed with their personal religion, beliefs or values”. This sets the bar extremely low for the seriousness of the wedding, and it is unclear what safeguards or training would be in place.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is founded on solemn promises made between two parties. Under these proposals it would be possible to have a legally recognised wedding in which no words were said between the couple, let alone promises of any kind. The current prescribed words form a strong foundation for marriage. Without them the wedding ceremony can be as meaningless as a couple or officiant chooses, and legal marriage can become nothing more than a certificate from the Government.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Society has been founded on serious and faithful relationships. It is, therefore, far more important that a legal wedding ceremony reflects the seriousness of the commitment the parties are making than that it is personalised to the couple.

This would allow groups such as churches to conduct wedding ceremonies at their usual venues. The concern is that it is unclear what safeguards will be in place to prevent unsuitable venues being used.

Please tell us why you regard the information as confidential:

Would you kindly treat our personal data as strictly confidential. The reason for our request for confidentiality is that many people like ourselves have reservations about the politicisation of sexuality and the shifting of our social handholds. We are very concerned that some of those who wish to cement 'gay' ( and 'transgender') into our social structures have aggressively targeted those who express contrary opinions. For example, the highly respected author and journalist, [REDACTED], was given a mock award as [REDACTED]. Consultation Question 20:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Many churches do not currently have their own authorised person to conduct weddings, perhaps because they do not hold many weddings or for other reasons of impracticality .

In such circumstances the churches rely upon civil registrars to register weddings. If this becomes no longer possible, the parties to the wedding are likely to need a civil ceremony which is separate to their church wedding. Alternatively, in order to hold a religious ceremony such churches may struggle and fail to attain the required familiarity with the legal requirements, inadvertently putting themselves in breach of the law.

The phrase 'contrary to public policy or morality' would potentially penalise those whose views are traditional or more conservative than the prevailing popular culture. For example, millions of people continue to hold to the view that the biblical definition of marriage as being between a man and a woman with the intention of a life-long commitment, a view which has been universally held for millennia. Organisations which represent such views should not be excluded merely because they do not conform to the popular culture of the day, which may be aggressively promoted by sexual minority pressure groups, the media or celebrities.

Please expand on your answer:

Currently, wedding officiants tend to have a strong belief in the importance of marriage in our society, and are trained to preserve and protect the dignity and solemnity of marriage, striving to ensure that the parties fully appreciate the duties and responsibilities of entering into a commitment which is the bedrock of a healthy society.

Independent officiants can currently conduct weddings which are not legally binding, and have been known to result in ceremonies which are bizarre and likely to bring the institution of marriage into disrepute, for example in a sadomasochism dungeon.

Independent officiants could purport to conduct a 'religious' ceremony which in fact seriously misrepresents the religious body's belief, say on same-sex marriage.

Independent officiants would naturally be more inclined towards the commercial aspects of their business and push the boundaries of what is acceptable, resulting in bizarre ceremonies which undermine the dignity and solemnity of marriage to the detriment of the whole of society.

There should be clear guidance to officiants to ensure that the officiants understand that they are under a solemn duty to uphold the dignity and solemnity of marriage. The meaning of 'dignity' and 'solemnity' should be clearly explained in such a way that officiants understand the boundaries of what is acceptable in order to avoid the dignity and solemnity being undermined.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is essential that the parties orally and in person articulate their consent to marry each other in order to maintain the dignity and solemnity of the occasion and for them to internalise the seriousness of the commitment which they are making to each other. Any removal of the physical face to face expression of commitment would

- i) seriously undermine the importance and solemnity of the commitment being entered into
- ii) detract from the essential public declaration which is intrinsic to the marriage ceremony
- iii) detract from the expectation that the marriage would be respected and honoured by society as a whole, instead of being reduced to a private arrangement between the parties.

Officiants should be provided with a prescribed form of wording which is clear and unambiguous and which conveys the momentous nature of the commitment which each party is entering into.

It is wholly inadequate for the marriage to be solemnised merely on the basis of a written consent.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The provisional proposal would provide far too much scope for the form and ceremony to be de-solemnised to such an extent as to undermine the dignity and solemnity of the occasion. It is essential that the form and ceremony clearly promote the seriousness of the commitment entered into by the parties,

- i) which is in their interests;
- ii) in the interests of the whole of society which has an interest in the stability of marriage which is the bedrock of a healthy society;
- iii) which protects the officiant from being pressured into agreeing to an unsuitable form and ceremony.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It is essential that the existing requirements for a wedding to take place with open doors, or otherwise for public access to be allowed, should be retained in order that it reinforces the understanding that:

- i) marriage is in the interests of the whole of society which benefits from the continuing stability of marriage which is the bedrock of a healthy society;
- ii) the parties to the marriage not only freely consent to the marriage, but can be seen to freely consent to the marriage which protects the vulnerable from coercion.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The advantages of providing that all weddings should take place in venues which meet prescribed conditions greatly outweigh the potential disadvantages of allowing a free for all.

The advantages that all weddings should take place in venues which meet prescribed conditions are as follows:

- i) there is greater certainty that venues will meet the criteria of suitably reflecting the dignity and solemnity of the ceremony;
- ii) the 'open doors' principle that the wedding should be accessible to the public can be more easily observed which satisfies the interest of society in ensuring that weddings are properly conducted;
- iii) the officiant is protected from undue pressure to officiate at a ceremony at an unsuitable venue, which does not adequately recognise the significance of the occasion and may not meet the health and safety requirements for all in attendance.

The potential disadvantages of allowing a free choice of venue are as follows:-

- i) the venue may seriously undermine the dignity and solemnity of the ceremony
- ii) the venue may be inaccessible to the public who have legitimate interest in ensuring that weddings are properly conducted;
- iii) instances of coercion and bigamy are more likely to be undetected;
- iv) the officiant is not protected from undue pressure to officiate at a ceremony at an unsuitable venue which may not meet the health and safety requirements for all in attendance.

Please share your views below:

Weddings on inland waters such as lakes or rivers, in the air, and/or in private homes are highly unlikely to satisfy the following criteria:-

- i) maintaining the dignity and solemnity of the ceremony which is commensurate with the seriousness of the commitment which the parties enter into;
- ii) ensuring the 'open doors' principle that the wedding should be accessible to the public;
- iii) ensuring that the venue meets appropriate health and safety requirements for members of the public who may wish to attend;
- iv) providing sufficient protection to the officiant from undue pressure to conduct the ceremony in an unsuitable location.

Consultation Question 49:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This provisional proposal gives insufficient weight to the need to preserve:

- i) the dignity and solemnity of the ceremony, being commensurate with the seriousness of the commitment being entered into;
- ii) the public's legitimate interest in ensuring that weddings are properly conducted;
- iii) a measure of deterrence against instances of improper behaviour including coercion and bigamy.

Consultation Question 50:

Yes

Yes

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Churches must be able to insist that only Christian religious ceremonies take place in their buildings according to Canon Law. In addition the civil law should be clear and robust in protecting the Churches from legal action based on claims of discrimination for refusing a non-religious ceremony in the building.

Consultation Question 51:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This provisional proposal potentially fails to provide sufficient protection to the officiant from undue pressure to conduct the ceremony in a wholly unsuitable location.

Consultation Question 52:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

It is unclear how officiants would be able to assess whether a location meets the criteria of 'safe and dignified' taking into account the following:

- i) these terms are not defined and would require strict safeguards;
- ii) the dignity and solemnity of the ceremony which is commensurate with the seriousness of the commitment which the parties enter into would need to be upheld;
- iii) the 'open doors' principle that the wedding should be accessible to the public should be upheld;
- iv) the venue must meet appropriate health and safety and accessibility requirements for members of the public who may wish to attend;
- iv) it is hard to see how the officiant can be sufficiently protected from undue pressure to conduct the ceremony in an unsuitable location.

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Whatever guidance is produced to officiants will only be guidance and will inevitably result in officiants being pressured to push to boundaries as to what is acceptable or presenting an opportunity to officiants themselves to push the boundaries so as to create more business for themselves at the expense of preserving the dignity and solemnity of the ceremony which is commensurate with the seriousness of the commitment which the parties enter into.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

I am concerned that it's possible that no promises may be made and that the definition of marriage itself may be destroyed. I think there should be a formal declaration by the officiating person that the couple are now married and at that point, the marriage is formed

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If there is no recognised form at all, the whole thing is too fluid and loses its meaning. Marriage should be regulated in some way or why bother....just have a "get-together" ?

Consultation Question 44:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I think that the categories you list should be the only ones to hold their own services, not open them up to other people

Consultation Question 45:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Many people cherish their religious views without necessarily wanting to be married in a place of worship..it would be important and meaningful to them to have some religious content

Please share your views below:

I don't feel that it is necessary to specify what may be allowed. I assume the registrar would "ok" any content for suitability

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

They may be a number of reasons for people to choose a civil ceremony but people of faith would be distressed if the provision to consolidate their vows in a religious service were to be taken away

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Perhaps this would make forced marriage easier

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

To me, "contrary to public policy or morality" seems a somewhat subjective term. Because of that it is possible that people with views that are not currently trendy (though legal) could conceivably be prevented from nominating officiants. So, the test should instead concentrate on objective criteria. Such criteria could refer to opposing terrorism or the violent overthrow of democracy.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Under the present system, wedding officiants are either professional registrars or religious representatives who will have strongly-held views on marriage. Allowing independent officiants would open the door to those who may not place such an appropriately high value on marriage, risking that the wedding could end up being trivialised.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

It would be peculiar if it is possible for a person to get married without being present at the wedding ceremony! Simply signing the marriage schedule has to be inadequate. Couples would be able to say anything they like or nothing at all. This is a major departure from the public declarations that for many years have been considered foundational to the legal marriage ceremony. Such an approach risks undermining the solemnity of the wedding ceremony and denying the seriousness of the commitment being made.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

A particular ceremony should not just be allowed because the couple wants it, but because the form of the ceremony is appropriate for such a serious and solemn event. A wedding is a public declaration in which both society and the state have an interest.

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The “open doors” requirement may to some people seem a bit archaic, but in reality the requirement helps to convey the public nature of wedding declarations. Removing this requirement encourages an unhelpful perception that marriage is a private matter without any public significance.

Chapter 7: Location

Please expand on your answer:

In principle a sound idea. However in practice it depends upon the criteria for authorisation and what the requirements are when conducting weddings. This could open the way to all sorts of strange ceremonies which would lead to marriage being devalued. It would introduce a financial incentive to conduct marriages which could lead officials to doing anything and every thing just for the sake of their fee. This proposal would need to be accompanied by checks and balances

To allow this to be done behind closed doors opens up the way for abuse.

It could mean that someone with a genuine reason to object was prevented from doing so.

There seems to reason whatsoever todo this.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Whilst there is scope for widening the current requirements there need to be checks and balances. In particular it would depend upon how "dignified and safe" is defined.

Please expand on your answer:

The consultation is quite right to try to provide 'ceremonies that are meaningful to the couple', but this proposal would exclude many churches from being able to provide wedding ceremonies if they don't have a minister or don't feel confident in fulfilling the complexities of marriage law.

The proposal is clearly well-intentioned, but is too vague. 'Contrary to public policy or morality' risks excluding those whose views are unpopular but legal (e.g., traditional Christian sexual ethics). Why not make the tests more objective? - i.e, any organisation that promotes illegal activity (e.g. terrorism or underage weddings), or advocates the violence against the state or rejects the rule of law)?

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I'm very nervous at the thought of people taking weddings who are not well trained registrars or religious representatives - it would commercialise and trivialise weddings as the celebrants would have every financial incentive to agree to any suggestions, however silly, irreverent or inappropriate (celebrants have previously taken ceremonies in a sadomasochism dungeon and at a ruined leper hospital at halloween). That would drive up the costs of weddings, as well as reduce the seriousness and weightiness of marriage vows. What training and safeguarding protocols would be put in place to make sure that the law was being upheld, along with the seriousness of the marriage vows?

Please expand on your answer:

It's very hard to see what marriage is if it doesn't include weighty promises between the two people getting married. It cannot be right to have a wedding (as these proposals would allow) where the couple don't say anything to each other, let alone make any promises. The prescribed words are a currently a small part of the service with enormous flexibility around them - taking them out would send a message that this a casual and merely personal matter and that marriage is just a government-issued scrap of paper.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I appreciate the concern to 'personalise' weddings, but that concern must not trump the priority of the commitment the couple are making to each other. (That commitment is of enormous value to them and to society, and to reduce it to a merely personal bit of fun sends a very worrying signal). The officiants may be required to uphold the 'dignity and solemnity of marriage', but I'm fairly confident there'll be someone who'll be willing to go along with the most ridiculous suggestions (especially if it's well paid).
It's also worth noting the scope here for blending elements from different faith traditions in ways that would highly offensive to people of those faiths. (Can you imagine the uproar at a nudist wedding that included syncretistic Muslim and Hindu prayers?)

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

This is another well-intentioned, but really dangerous proposal. There is a reason why wedding receptions are traditionally by invitation, but weddings themselves must be 'open doors'. It sends an important message that marriage is not a merely personal agreement, but has huge social implications, and, even, more importantly, is an important safeguarding requirement to protect against forced marriage and bigamy.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

I can see the possible advantages of loosening the laws here, but the dangers are far greater. Who will decide what counts as a 'dignified and safe' location? Is it the celebrant, who is being paid to go along with it? The Law Commission proposes 'weddings in the air' would be fine - that sounds to me like a very loose interpretation of both 'safe' and 'dignified'. Reports of unofficial weddings with couples dressed as hedgehogs make me fear that marriage will be trivialised very damagingly by these proposals.

This would interfere with our church's ability to hold weddings (Baptist church), as we don't have an authorised person for registering them. Even if we did, we are a small church with infrequent weddings so would quite likely break the law inadvertently.

Independent officiants would not restrict what could be included in a ceremony, and does not indicate any training or monitoring of their behaviour. They would likely do it for profit, creating a new market. If the couple choose a religious ceremony, they shouldn't be able to assume they can ignore the religion's beliefs or standards of behaviour.

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Marriage is not an entirely private matter, so wedding ceremonies should have legally required words. The few prescribed words currently are what makes the wedding genuine and not just casual. Your proposal would allow weddings with no promises, amounting to just a certificate from the government.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

If couples try to combine elements from ceremonies of different faiths, they could easily cause offence and make the wedding a parody. Opening it up to commercial competition will reward low standards and undermine the dignity of wedding ceremonies.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

What does it mean that venues are 'dignified and safe'? They need to be places fit for a solemn occasion, and it's fine if churches want to hold proper ceremonies in shared buildings they don't have registered. But I'm worried there is no clarity about safeguards to prevent unsuitable venues being used.

or

Please expand on your answer:

Couples applying for marriage, their friends and more likely to be present when the banns are read than when the notice is merely posted at a register office.

Chapter 5: Officiants

Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The officiant's role is important, to ensure that the marriage is conducted in a proper manner.

Consultation Question 20:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

It depends on the status of the officiant at the place of worship. Perhaps certification needs to be given, so that officiants have adequate training and status within the denomination or religious group in which they are operating.

Consultation Question 21:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

In general, I agree, but I am concerned that if a registration officer gets something wrong or does not carry out the necessary preliminaries the wedding party (i.e. the couple and their guests) would not know and the marriage could be invalid.

Consultation Question 22:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Clerks in holy orders must be trained to conduct weddings. This does not always take place at theological college or during non-residential courses, but should be a requirement for a training incumbent.

Consultation Question 24:

Other

Please expand on your answer:

Would such an organisation be a nationally or internationally recognised body? There is a danger that a group could be established for the sole purpose of enabling a small number of marriages in, for example, a commune or cult. The organisation needs to be very carefully defined.

Please share your views below:

Yes, this would be a useful safeguard. It would be clearer to define what types of organisation could offer weddings rather than proscribe those which could not.

Consultation Question 25:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

20 is too low a number, because it is smaller than one congregation. Potentially it could result in a vast number of groups conducting their own marriages and the whole concept of marriage becoming very much a localised and individual affair. Marriage must have a universal meaning in order to be of any lasting value.

Consultation Question 26:

Please share your views below:

Yes, although this would be controversial. However, it is necessary in order to maintain the solemnity and dignity of monogamous marriage.

Consultation Question 27:

Please share your views below:

Only if the officiants are adequately trained and of suitable standing.

Consultation Question 28:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

If this is not done, then officiating at marriages becomes a 'free for all' and the dignity of marriage is threatened.

Consultation Question 29:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There must be a sponsoring organisation. There is a danger of some individuals assuming the role of independent marriage officiant for personal financial gain or even as a career.

Consultation Question 30:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Absolutely vital.

Consultation Question 35:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

The terms 'dignity' and 'solemnity' require amplification. The responsibility to ensure these extends to the applicants too. The content and tone of the ceremony are vitally important.

Consultation Question 38:

Consultation Question 39:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Thought needs to be given to the monitoring process. Would 'inspectors' visit marriage ceremonies?

Consultation Question 40:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Authorisation should be time limited because people move house, change their circumstances and grow older. Other roles are time limited and this does give the opportunity for officiants to be assessed periodically. A relatively long period of authorisation would perhaps be a useful compromise.

Consultation Question 41:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Chapter 6: The wedding ceremony

Consultation Question 42:

No

Please expand on your answer:

There needs to be a form of 'prescribed words' for consent, so that the couple and the public know that they are entering into a new relationship which is universally recognised and respected. The marriage document is an expression of what happens at the ceremony, not a substitute for it.

Consultation Question 43:

No

Please expand on your answer:

The solemnity and dignity of marriage implies that the form of words used should be universally acceptable, not just something agreed between the couple. Marriage is a public event and status and the words used should be externally moderated. However, this does not prevent a couple from using additional words. The 'prescribed words' should be seen as a minimum.

Consultation Question 44:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Consultation Question 45:

Yes

Please expand on your answer:

Although one wonders why a couple would want to include religious content in a civil wedding ceremony, there seems to be no reason why religious content, e.g. music, readings and prayers, should not be added to a civil wedding. If the form of words used is expanded, then it is discriminatory to exclude religious content. How can it be defined, in any case?

Please share your views below:

See above.

Consultation Question 46:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Why? If it is proposed to make provisions broader, then it is surely up to the couple and their religious leaders to decide. Or would repeal simply tidy up the situation?

Consultation Question 47:

No

Please expand on your answer:

As stated above, marriage is a public status and event, recognised and respected by society as a whole. Public access is vital, even if the provision is not used very often. Religious services are supposed to permit open access and marriage ceremonies should do the same. This does, of course, mean that it is inappropriate to hold wedding ceremonies in restricted locations, such as in the air, under the sea and in private homes.

Chapter 7: Location

Consultation Question 48:

No

Please expand on your answer:

Not all venues are safe and dignified. It is not appropriate for weddings to take place in situations where witnesses and friends are excluded, e.g. in the air or in the sea. The use of some venues, e.g. theme parks and fast food restaurants, would trivialise the status of marriage.

on inland waters such as lakes or rivers,, in the air, and/or, in private homes.

Please share your views below:

Getting married is a public event and it should be possible for anyone to witness the occasion. This would not be possible in these situations.
