Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

It's surrogacy. It should be entered into only when all parties expect and understand that the baby will go home with the intended parents, rather than the birth mother. If this is understood and expected by all, it should also be the legal situation.

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

18 Consultation Question 11:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

I agree that the surrogate needs to have the right to register an objection, but I am uncertain as to what this would mean in practice. On what grounds is she able to object? What would that entail? If the case is still that the surrogate is able to automatically gain custody of the baby, the right to object maintains all the problems with the current situation. Perhaps it would be better to decide whether the law sees the baby as belonging to the surrogate, or belonging to the parents, and then make that categorical rather than continuing to try and straddle both? But again, I'm not sure the details of the right to object so uncertain whether these concerns apply.

19 Consultation Question 12:

No

Please provide your views below:

I think this is the problem with surrogacy - it does not provide enough stability for the intended parents, and it is a terrifying prospect that you could conceive a child, have that child borne for 9 months by a surrogate, and then have them snatched away from you with no warning at birth. If there is to be a change in the law, it should be in favour of a clearer legal message - either the baby is rightfully the surrogates, or it is rightfully the intended parents.

Similarly, if the intended parents make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood, and that is likely to go through, this right to object doesn't add anything beneficial - if the child is going to ultimately be the intended parents anyway, adding a time period where neither surrogate nor intended parent can be sure that that will happen just puts them both through torment for no reason.

20 Consultation Question 13:

No

Please provide your views below:

This feels like far too late to be obtaining consent.

I feel like what is important is that the situation is clear and consistent throughout the whole surrogacy process. There should be adequate consent and capacity assessment prior to conception, as well as a commitment on both parts (i.e. surrogate and intended parents) that everyone is definitely clear that the baby will go home with IP. This should be rechecked and discussed at every antenatal appointment. None of this should still be in question at the point of the birth.

I also think that this approach would be better for surrogate mother - giving up a child that you have carried may be difficult or distressing, but I am not sure that it would be less so if you are in doubt as to whether or not you have the option of raising that child.

Similarly, I think the relationship between surrogate and intended parents would be fraught and difficult if both had the impression that the other was trying to steal their baby..

Yes

22 Consultation Question 15:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

No

Please share your views below:

I understand that the law here is complicated, but I think it depends on the specific surrogacy arrangement. The genetic parents have a claim on parental rights, as does the woman who carries the baby. The spouse of any of these does not have a claim.

So e.g. if a surrogate gives birth to a child conceived with her egg and X's sperm, her and X have a right to parenthood. Neither of their spouses do (unless there has been a pre-agreed surrogacy arrangement etc.) However, if a surrogate gives birth to a child conceived with X's sperm and Y's egg, all three have a claim to parenthood in the absence of an arrangement, but nobody else does.

23 Consultation Question 16:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

I would suggest that there be some sort of automatic process here, because this sounds like a horrific piece of bureaucracy to have to deal with when you've just lost your child.

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

I think the new pathway should contain sufficient explicit discussion and paperwork to ensure that in the event of surrogate death, the intended parents automatically become the legal parents. The approach should be that surrogates only exercise their right to object very rarely and for entirely unforeseen reasons, and that intended parents are rarely expected to go through the process of applying for a parental order. That situation would mean that in the event of surrogate death, a process that would otherwise be straightforward and simple would become fraught with practical and emotional challenges - for no good reason, the surrogate being dead thus means that they are unable to parent the child anyway. What is the purpose of expecting the intended parents to go through an application?

26 Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes. It should not be the case that the surrogate is expected to keep and raise the baby.

Please provide your views below:

I don't know - I am unsure of how formalised surrogacy arrangements can be. I am wary of automatically making the surrogate a legal parent, because it undermines the notion that intended parents are really parents and suggests that the surrogate is indeed really the mother. Again, it depends on who the genetic parents are, and how clear all parties are prior to birth/death about the process. Also, whether the surrogate actually wants to raise a baby - it should not be assumed that she will, or that she will feel like a mother to that baby.

27 Consultation Question 20:

Other

Please provide your views below:

Again, this needs to be clearer from earlier on! It should not be left until after birth for it to be clear in paperwork who the intended parents are.

28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

I'm unsure. To me, what keeps jumping out as important is how scary it is as intended parents to feel that your baby might be taken out of your care. Similarly, for the sake of child wellbeing, I think it is important that children born through surrogacy have at least an option of a childhood that is as normal as possible. For the family of intended parents + child, it is important to be able to feel assured that you can just take your baby home and be parents like everyone else. From that perspective, I don't think the surrogate should have parental rights, regardless of the time frame involved or the specific details.

However, this depends on things like specific genetic arrangements - I feel differently if the surrogate has conceived with her own eggs.

Similarly, parental rights are a specific set of privileges. Perhaps a better approach would be to allow surrogates to claim the right to be kept updated as to the child's wellbeing, or even to have some contact? So rather than being a parent who has parental rights, a surrogate can object to having the child removed entirely from her life, and be given the right in law to be provided with (e.g.) annual updates from the parents as to child wellbeing, with the option of visits or contact (perhaps further down the line with child consent?). This would respect both the surrogate mother's unique connection to the child, and the need for the intended parents to experience full, normal parenthood.

32 Consultation Question 25: We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Please provide your views below:

33 Consultation Question 26:

No

Please provide your views below:

There needs to be the consent of the surrogate mother. This should be obtained before birth, but it does need to be present - otherwise, how can there be certainty that the process was really surrogacy, as opposed to (e.g.) unintended pregnancy as the result of marital affair?

Doctors/midwives could play a role here - pregnant women get antenatal care, it would be reasonably straightforward to include a question about surrogacy in standard 'booking in' maternal visits, and then to document the findings. Doctors already document everything for medicolegal purposes so there is a precedent, and then there would be a document from the beginning of pregnancy confirming everyone's expectations/involvement at the outset.

34 Consultation Question 27:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

I think the default should be that the surrogate mother is not a parent (unless it is a baby conceived with her egg), and therefore does not have parental rights.

36 Consultation Question 29:

Please provide your views below:

I think the genetic parents should have parental rights, and that anyone else does not have parental rights by default.

Additionally, I think it would be unwise to put a legal emphasis on who takes the baby home from hospital. If I thought my surrogate might be able to claim parental rights over my baby, and I knew that taking the baby home from hospital gave me more claim to having those rights, I would definitely consider just taking the baby from the hospital at the first opportunity. This puts a horrible burden on the relationship between parents and surrogate - how can you be honest and respectful if you're both terrified that the other is going to lay claim to the baby without your consent?

What is needed is for the legal process and rights to be clear and straightforward, and everyone aware of them, so that the relationship can be transparent and mutually considerate.

Chapter 9: The Regulation of Surrogacy Arrangements

37 Consultation Question 30: We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

I think that the genetic parents matter - it makes a difference who is related to the child. Traditional surrogacy should still be in the new pathway, but there should be different provisions for those surrogates who are related to the baby.

38 Consultation Question 31: We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Please provide your views below:

39 Consultation Question 32:

Please provide your views below:

Please provide your views below:

For gestational surrogacy, the genetic parents should be legal parents, automatically, and the surrogate should have the right to claim contact if she wants. Additionally, there could be a process through which surrogate could go to court for parental orders, but I do not know if this would be helpful for anyone.

For traditional surrogacy, genetic parents should be legal parents, automatically, and then there should be a process of granting a parental order to intended parents, with the full consent (consistently given throughout the pregnancy) of everyone.

Both of these should take place within the context of a well supported professional care pathway, in which discussions are well documented. Indeed, informal surrogacy arrangements should be picked up as a matter of course by the maternity team when booking in a new pregnancy.

40 Consultation Question 33:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

When approaching surrogacy, I have two major concerns.

The first is that I will conceive a baby with my spouse, a surrogacy will carry that baby, and then at the last moment we will be denied the right to parent that child as our own.

The second is that I will not be able to find a surrogate or get started on the whole process. I am concerned that I will be unable to do it at all either because I can't afford it, or because the surrogates available will be looking for an arrangement in which they are a third parent. I do not want a three parent family - I want to raise our children with my spouse like everybody else gets to!

A regulated surrogacy organisation would answer the second concern - I want it to be clear and straightforward how to access surrogates and negotiate the process. A clear legal framework would address the first concern.

43 Consultation Question 36: We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

Please provide your views below:

As an intended parent, I would be looking for the following:

- An organisation to whom I could apply who would then connect me with a surrogate
- Reassurance/confidence that the organisation has ensured that the surrogate is fully consenting, fully aware of what surrogacy means, and has capacity to do so (i.e. isn't coerced, isn't expecting to have a child, etc..)
- Reassurance that the organisation has ensured everything is legally above board, and all correct paperwork has been managed

44 Consultation Question 37: We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The organisation who is matching surrogates and intended parents is responsible for ensuring that the surrogate is mentally well, consenting, has capacity, and fully informed of what she is doing. They are also responsible for this for the intended parents, but its the surrogate for whom this is most sensitive (although the organisation must ensure, for example, that the intended parents know they are having a baby and can't pull out).

49 Consultation Question 41: We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

I think surrogacy should be available on the NHS, as is IVF, for those who are unable to have children without surrogacy. I would be willing to pay a reasonable fee to have my surrogacy facilitated, but I am concerned that allowing surrogacy only to the wealthy is discrimination - why should the poor be denied the choices to have children that the rich have? This is classic health inequality, and should not be introduced into new legislation.

Additionally, if I was paying for the surrogacy, I would feel that I had more of a right to demand that my rights were protected. If I paid an organisation to arrange me a surrogate, and then that surrogate changed their mind, I would feel that the organisation had not provided the service I had bought, and expect a refund.

50 Consultation Question 42: We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

I don't think that the advertising is where the concern is. Surrogacy is important, it should be accessible. However, there should be strict and careful regulation of how women can be recruited as surrogates - I would perhaps go as far as suggesting a ban on recruitment, and only allow volunteers to become surrogates? This is the most important aspect of an organisation for me - I do not feel I would be able to accurately assess a surrogate's state of mind myself to ensure she is informed and suitable for surrogacy, especially as I would be so emotionally invested, so I want to feel confident that the organisation and the law are handling that aspect for me. This is where the regulation is needed, not the advertisements.

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Do consultees agree?

52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes, but this has to be carefully worded. In gestational surrogacy, it should be very clear that the parents are the intended parents, but that the baby was carried by the surrogate. It should not suggest that the child is related to the surrogate, or that the surrogate is a third parent. Many people do not understand how genetics/pregnancy work biologically, and I would be very concerned of teenagers accessing this information and then seeking out their 'third parent' only to be confronted with a surrogate who feels no parental feelings towards that child at all.

53 Consultation Question 45: We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

54 Consultation Question 46: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings. Do consultees agree?

55 Consultation Question 47:

No

Please provide your views below:

I am uncomfortable with this idea for two reasons. Firstly, this is largely a register of infertile and/or LGBT people, and that feels like a dodgy idea. Secondly, I think it is important to prioritise that families born through surrogacy are still normal families, and the expectation that they have to be on a special register interferes with that. Why is this necessary? This information should be accessible on an individual basis from things like birth certificates, health records, legal documents - there is no need to centralise it.

58 Consultation Question 50: We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

Huh, there's an idea. I do not know if this matters. I think it is important to know whether your partner is related to you, so it is important to know if you share a genetic parent, but this should be covered by birth certificates or legal parental orders etc.

Allowing this provision for gestational surrogacy implies a biological falsehood - there is no genetic relationship between the foetus and the surrogate, so it doesn't mean anything if you were carried by the same surrogate. Suggesting that it does reinforces the idea that the surrogate is a mother/relative in some way.

But, this is just my opinion, and I understand that other people might feel weird about this.

59 Consultation Question 51:

Not Answered

Please provide your views below:

I am not sure what is meant here? If people are genetically related, they should be able to contact each other, but I am unsure whether this in itself justifies the creation of a register. However, being born to the same surrogate does not entail that you are genetically related, so this should only apply to those who share the same genetic mother, and that shouldn't require a register to facilitate contact?

Other

Please provide your views below:

If the provisions for allowing the intended parents to be granted a parental order are as simple as they are looking after the child with the consent of the surrogate, they should be granted parental rights automatically rather than through a legal process.

The welfare clause opens up a concerning possibility - intended parents could coerce a vulnerable woman into being a surrogate, e.g. through payments, with the intention of obtaining a parental order based on knowledge that the court would not consider the surrogate a fit parent. So for example, someone who has already had children removed into foster care could become pregnant, sign a consent form in exchange for a payment, attempt to obtain parental rights, and then have the parental order given to the intended parents on the basis that she cannot raise the child. There should be protection against this if possible.

I think surrogates should have the right to anonymity if they choose. A gestational surrogate is not a parent - if she wishes to remain anonymous and uncontactable, and the parents accept this, she should not have to be put on a register indefinitely. She may feel that this suggests she is a parent to the child she carried, or that it impacts the relationship she has with her own children that she is raising, or similar. If a surrogate and the intended parents all genuinely want to cut ties and have the surrogacy just be a kind act that is now finished, that option should exist.

72 Consultation Question 64:

Please provide your views below:

No. There should be welfare provisions in who can have custody of a child, but these have to be based on capacity to care for a child, which may be related to age but is not defined by age. Thus restricting by age is discrimination.

73 Consultation Question 65:

No

Please provide your views below:

I feel that surrogates should be much older than 18, preferably having had their own children already (if only because they then know how they find pregnancy). All the legislation and regulation should promote surrogates who are stable adults with experience who are fully aware of what they are doing.

However, in the event that a teenager does find themselves in a surrogacy arrangement, denying the option of a parental order does not feel helpful.

Possibly older, or with other requirements.

This may prove financially impractical. Efforts should be made to minimise the extent to which wealth influences the availability of surrogacy arrangements.

77 Consultation Question 69:

Please provide your views below:

I am unsure. Criminals can become parents, so why should they be prevented from becoming parents through surrogacy? I think a criminal record should only prevent you embarking upon surrogacy if it would entail that the child would be removed from your care anyway. Otherwise, it is irrelevant.

78 Consultation Question 70: We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

On balance, I think this is probably a good idea and a reasonable requirement. However, there may need to be exceptions. For example, someone may want to be a surrogate for a close relative or friend, despite having never given birth?

In general though, yes I think it is reasonable, and a good way of ensuring that surrogate parents are fully aware of what they are committing to.

81 Consultation Question 73:

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate should not be out of pocket. Thus their essential payments depend on factors such as whether they are working prior to pregnancy, entitled to maternity pay from their employer, supported by a spouse whose income does not change during pregnancy, etc. I would consider loss of income to be essential, as well as travel to healthcare appointments.

However, this also depends heavily on the financial situation of the intended parents. My spouse and I have a decent income - I would be happy to cover things like maternity clothing, comfort aids, etc.. However, if I was on a lower income, these costs may prove impossible to cover.

Perhaps the matching organisation should cover this - there could be a set fee which is set by that organisation and provided by parents to surrogate to cover 'extras' like clothing, comfort aids, etc..

I do not believe that the surrogate should profit from the surrogacy. I am not against commercial surrogacy from the point of view of the surrogate, but I think it introduces inequality into the provision of surrogacy - surrogacy should be equally available to everyone who needs it to have a family.

Compensation is a means of profiting. It is difficult to define and it may result in a situation where wealthier parents can offer financial incentive to access surrogates, while poorer families cannot.

Please provide your views below:

If the surrogate is financially impacted, she should be compensated. This should not arise because of the NHS, but say if the surrogate needs to get a taxi to hospital, or similar.

88 Consultation Question 80: We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

Again, this places a barrier between people who are not rich and surrogacy. There should not be a cost on the intended parents for these tragic consequences.

89 Consultation Question 81:

Please provide your views below:

I think gifts should be fine so long as they are spontaneous rather than expected, and thus cannot be used as a means of bribing people to become surrogate. So for example, buying a thank you gift after birth would be fine, but including the offer of a new car on your appeal for surrogates is not. Modest/reasonable provision might be adequate here.

90 Consultation Question 82:

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

Please provide your views below:

Healthcare in the UK ought to be available to everyone regardless of income. Commercial surrogacy makes sense in contexts like the US where it is expected that you pay for healthcare; in the UK, it serves to move surrogacy out of the remit of infertility and healthcare, and into the remit of employment. In the UK, we generally don't pay for things like this - we also can't legally buy kidneys or liver, and we don't expect to pay for blood transfusions. IVF is more complex, but in theory it is accepted that everyone has the right to a limited number of IVF attempts on the NHS without cost. The same provision needs to apply to surrogacy - it should be something that infertile people have access to, and something that surrogates do because they freely choose to, rather than because it's a plausible means of making money. Similarly, I am concerned that introducing a payment alters the nature of the relationship between surrogate and parents - the parents ought to see the surrogate as an equal partner in the arrangement, rather than someone that they are employing and thus have rights over.

91 Consultation Question 83:

Please provide views below:

No. If payment is accepted, it needs to be clear. Any money given at the beginning of pregnancy is a payment for embarking upon pregnancy. No refunds should be entertained. However, there may be scope for a further payment at the end of the whole process, which will be given only if the process runs to completion.

92 Consultation Question 84: We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order. Do consultees agree?

94 Consultation Question 86: We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

There should be funding available from the NHS for this. While things like income costs may have to be worked out case by case, this should be done by an independent organisation (rather than surrogate/parents), and there should thus be a flat fee available close to the beginning of pregnancy (or before pregnancy) which is just paid, and then that's the financial element over (unless further costs emerge, which should be provided for in initial agreement documentation).

The surrogate should not be out of pocket, regardless of what ends up happening in the pregnancy (including her choices).

However, I think this is only really feasible in the context of there not being a payment/compensation arrangement. In commercial surrogacy, it might be reasonable to expect the surrogate (as an employee) to uphold her contract, e.g. by not smoking or getting an abortion, if she expects to continue being paid. This dynamic is a major reason that I feel there should not be commercial surrogacy in the UK.

Currently, it is very difficult to access surrogacy. There is a charity that facilitates matching, but requires a longstanding commitment to a relationship (friendship) with the surrogate. My spouse and I would like to have a child, and we would need to use surrogacy to do so, but we are not interested in introducing a third person into our lives. We would like to be full and proper parents to our child as a married couple, without the requirement of introducing an additional parenting element. The cost of surrogacy overseas that allows this arrangement runs into the hundreds of thousands, making it impossible for us (and I think most people!)

What we are looking for from reform is to have accessible, financially affordable, and reliable surrogacy, in which it is highly unlikely or impossible that we will not end up as the full parents of our child. Many of these reforms will support that end: I think a professional and official organisation that can connect us with a surrogate would be invaluable, and that they would need to handle the surrogate side of things (e.g. ensuring she is fully consenting and has capacity, etc.). I would also appreciate that organisation being a mediator in terms of finances, so that that isn't left to us to negotiate with the surrogate. I think all our rights should be clear and set out in law, and there should be a process through which we can ensure everything is open and transparent well before the birth of the child.

Dear [REDACTED]

There is a huge amount of information to read to understand the proposed changes but as far as i can tell on a quick glance seem to be a very good thing i've had two situations that have caused me serious concern - both involving gestational surrogate twins and wonder how the new law might alter the interactions in these cases. Apologies for not taking the time to read it fully enough to discover whether my cases would be dealt with differently under the proposed legislation

In one case, one baby had significant abnormalities and there were discussions about whether to perform amniocentesis which of course had a small chance of causing the loss of both babies. its difficult to imagine a situation where invasive tests could not be anything other than the choice of the host, but it was difficult for the intended parents as they had no say in the decision whether to have it performed. More importantly was the issue of what to do if a serious but non lethal anomaly were identified. We faced the potential situation of one twin surviving with abnormality that the intended parents might have wished to terminate but the host might not or vice versa. Alternatively the intended parents could, in theory have chosen to only adopt the normal baby. As it happened nature took its course and the baby (that turned out did have down's syndrome as well as physical problems) died in utero with the survivor healthy and adopted as planned.

the second case also involved twins where one baby died in utero and the other was born prematurely. the relationship between host and intended parents broke down and although the surviving twin was adopted as planned, the host declined to let the intended parents see the post mortem result of the baby that died even though there may have been implications for the surviving baby. In addition the funeral of the stillborn baby was organised by the host as the IP's had no legal rights to become involved. The final difficulty for the IP's was even after the premature baby was well enough to move to another unit closer to their home near London (they were spending a fortune travelling up and down for many weeks), there was difficulty in deciding who should pay for the long ambulance transfer finally at the end of the second case, my sympathies were very much with the IP's but do know the host went on to be a surrogate for more couples. I thought there ought to be some way of any new potential IP's being made aware of any previous pregnancy difficulties.

In addition to the difficulties involving hard choices, is communication. Will the new legislation allow the IP's to be kept informed of all pregnancy complications that might affect their unborn baby?

all the best

JOINT CONSULTATION PAPER ON BUILDING FAMILIES THROUGH SURROGACY: A NEW LAW

The Scottish Law Commission and the Law Commission of England and Wales have today published a joint Consultation Paper on Building families through surrogacy: a new law. The paper, and a Summary, can be accessed at <https://www.scotlawcom.gov.uk/law-reform/consultations/>

Surrogacy has become a significant issue in today's society. Change is needed however to ensure that the interests of all the parties involved are properly regulated and protected. To reflect the wishes of surrogates and intended parents, the Law Commissions propose to allow intended parents to become legal parents when the child is born, subject to the surrogate retaining a right to object for a short period after the birth. This would replace the current system where the intended parents must make an application to the court after the child has been born, and do not become the parents of the child until a parental order has been granted.

This proposal for the creation of a new surrogacy process is one of several that the Law Commissions are now consulting on which aim to bring greater certainty, put the child at the centre of the process, and provide comfort and confidence to both the surrogate and the intended parents.

The consultation period will run until 27 September 2019. We would be most grateful to receive your responses to any or all of the questions and proposals. An online form, and letter explaining the consultation process, can be accessed through the link above.

Surrogate's spouse or civil partner should be regarded as the legal parent of the child unless it objects (to provide otherwise is disruptive of the relationship between surrogate and spouse/civil partner).

Yes

No

Please provide your views below:

In such a situation the surrogate should not be subjected to the additional stress of exercising a right to object.

No

Please provide your views below:

In such a situation the surrogate should not be subjected to the additional stress of giving such consent.

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

This imposes unnecessary stress on all involved.

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

In such a case the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

This is unnecessary, unrealistic and would cause significant legal and social problems.

29 Consultation Question 22:

No. Intended parents are not, and should not be regarded as, in the same category as persons currently entitled to apply for a section 8 order without leave.

33 Consultation Question 26:

No

Please provide your views below:

This approach would effectively remove any rights of the surrogate, therefore is not appropriate.

34 Consultation Question 27:

No

Please provide your views below:

This approach would effectively remove any rights of the surrogate, therefore is not appropriate.

35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate should retain parental responsibility until parental responsibility has been formally granted to someone else.

49 Consultation Question 41: We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

To permit charging for such activities would enable profit-making by the back door.

Please provide your views below:

Payment should be for medical costs incurred, not compensation for the consequences of pregnancy.

Please provide your views below:

a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or

Please provide your views below:

As a regulated matter, fees also should be regulated.

88 Consultation Question 80: We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

Purchase of life assurance should be permissible, but not a payment on death for public policy reasons.

89 Consultation Question 81:

Please provide your views below:

No. Any such arrangement would be open to abuse.

90 Consultation Question 82:

It should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

Please provide your views below:

No, this is not acceptable on public policy grounds as it would lead to exploitation.

Not Answered

Please provide your views below:

No fee should be permitted for the reasons given above.

Please provide any views below:

No fee should be payable, but essential costs.

91 Consultation Question 83:

Please provide views below:

No fee should be payable.

Not Answered

Please provide your views below:

No fee should be payable.

92 Consultation Question 84: We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

Yes, but this cannot include a fee.

93 Consultation Question 85: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

94 Consultation Question 86: We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

A child is not a commodity, therefore any payments other than essential costs such as healthcare are unacceptable on public policy grounds.

95 Consultation Question 87:

Please provide your views below:

A child is not a commodity, therefore any payments other than essential costs such as healthcare are unacceptable on public policy grounds.

96 Consultation Question 88:

Other

Please provide your views below:

An agreement to pay essential costs such as healthcare should be enforceable.

Other

Please provide your views below:

This is another reason why only essential costs should be payable - if some kind of fee is charged, there will be an expectation that additional contractual terms regarding lifestyle etc can be imposed.

Dear [REDACTED]

Thanks. Certainly treat it as a consultation response if that would be helpful: in reflection, however, could I have a slight amendment to the text (highlighted)?

“At their meeting yesterday, they agreed that CLAS should not respond to the consultation because the member Churches have differing views on the morality of surrogacy and could not possibly agree a common position. For example, Roman Catholics would be against it in principle: the Instruction on Respect for Human Life in its Origin and on The Dignity of Procreation issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith declares that Heterologous artificial fertilization is contrary to the unity of marriage, to the dignity of the spouses, to the vocation proper to parents, and to the child's right to be conceived and brought into the world in marriage and from marriage. I suspect that the views of the other mainstream Trinitarian denominations would not be dissimilar; on the other hand, Quakers and Unitarians, for example, might possibly have no problem with it.”

All the best,

However having read the most recent summary I am concerned that the document seems to imply the only reason a mother would seek to become an intended parent would be issues regarding her fertility. I would like to know whether disability is being considered in regards to surrogacy law reform?

detrimental to my health. In my case - I have Ehlers Danlos Syndrome - a genetic mutation in the collagen gene which causes musculoskeletal issues that would be exasperated by pregnancy such as subluxation and dislocation of The joints (I previously had an ectopic pregnancy and although I was only 7 weeks when it ended the increase in estrogen had begun already to 'loosen' my joints - causing significant pain and if I were to become pregnant there are risk factors common in people with EDS such as early labour and ruptures). I also have adult [REDACTED] for which I am prescribed [REDACTED] that are not cleared pregnancy and so if I were to become pregnant the medical advice is currently to stop taking them - which significantly affect my quality of life and potentially impact on decision making in regards to planning for a new baby.

Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Without this UK law will be undermined by a wealthy elite who can exploit economically disadvantaged women worldwide. This exploitation would be invisible.

Please provide your views below:

The judges would not be sufficiently expert.

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

The highest level of judiciary should be involved. In fact. Maybe it should be the House of Lords as it should be the exception not the rule.

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Please provide your views below:

Exploitation of a poor woman's body shouldn't become a standard routine procedure. Nor should the interest of the baby to stay with the mother who carried her or him be a trivial concern.

There are enough of our species on our planet; spending large amounts of money on extra humans is not in the worldwide public interest of our species to the extent it should have special consideration.

11 Consultation Question 4:

No

Please provide your views below:

A default that gives the wealthier parties preference is just shocking!

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

As above, defaulting to recognise the typically wealthier commissioning parent above the typically economically disadvantaged surrogate, at a time when she is recovering from pregnancy and birth is misogynistic abuse.

13 Consultation Question 6:

Please provide your views below:

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

No

Please provide your views below:

You would be legalising something like slavery, whereby with cash and the right connections and paperwork you can guarantee the purchase of a new human to your specifications.?

15 Consultation Question 8:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The child should have absolute right to access this information. Clinics and organisations with poor long term out turns should be identifiable.

100 years; or

Please provide your views below:

The impact will be through generations.

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

It is not in the interest of the child and their future descendants for this to be anonymous. Anonymity in donations has a record of abuse; all the tabloid stories about men with huge numbers of children for instance.

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

This should be completely prohibited.

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

The week after birth is not a period when the surrogate can make an informed decision. The six month period applicable to adoptions would be much more ethical. And actual Consent, but just silence.

19 Consultation Question 12:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The woman making the new person , the surrogate should obviously have rights!

20 Consultation Question 13:

Other

Please provide your views below:

Realistically any statement that any woman post partum less than a week has full capacity is completely absurd. There are so many cases of late diagnosis of pnd for instance. Within 6 months it might be possible.

21 Consultation Question 14:

No

Please provide your views below:

I cannot believe that this new human has been commissioned for the very purpose of taking it away from the mother of 9 months, incredibly traumatic, and you are thinking of this person and typed the sentence "no welfare considerations"!!

22 Consultation Question 15:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

It is possible the husband/wife/partner has been abusive and has encouraged this for financial reasons.

No

Please share your views below:

As above, they have not grown the child in their own body. The child is not really a child of their relationship. They could apply for stepparent adoption.

23 Consultation Question 16:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate will be allowed to grieve and should not have the expense unless they want to have this responsibility.

Yes

Please provide your views below:

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

We know surrogacy carries higher risks than standard pregnancies and this should be fully scrutinised.

26 Consultation Question 19:

Other

Please provide your views below:

At 6 months

Please provide your views below:

27 Consultation Question 20:

Other

Please provide your views below:

6 months period is relevant . Giving a child one parent is a massive decision when all humans ever have had two.

28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate should have rights until they give fully informed consent at 6 months,

29 Consultation Question 22:

Please provide your views below:

30 Consultation Question 23:

Please provide your views below:

31 Consultation Question 24:

Please provide your views below:

32 Consultation Question 25: We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Please provide your views below:

33 Consultation Question 26:

No

Please provide your views below:

Automatic shouldn't be applied to children. Children are important. Not just affluent wannabe parents.

34 Consultation Question 27:

No

Please provide your views below:

The law should not default to prioritise affluent wannabe parents above the baby who knows the voice etc of the surrogate.

35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.Do consultees agree?

Yes

45 Consultation Question 37: We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

46 Consultation Question 38: We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

Please provide your views below:

Criminal prosecutions of all involved or whose negligence led to the activity.

47 Consultation Question 39: We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

Would prefer if it was illegal but regulation better than nothing.

Please provide your views below:

48 Consultation Question 40: We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms). Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

It has long been agreed that there is no slavery in the law of England & Wales.

49 Consultation Question 41: We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

Worse than pimping and adult, its profiting on the sale of the woman's body and the n=baby.

50 Consultation Question 42: We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

How can you allow the advertising of babies for sale?

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Please provide your views below:

Chapter 11: Eligibility Criteria for a Parental Order

62 Consultation Question 54: We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished. Do consultees agree?

Please provide your views below:

No. The surrogate will be post-partum and her health may not put her in a place to make a reasoned decision, and there is no reason why paying intended parents should be in a better position than adoptive parents.

69 Consultation Question 61: We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order. Please provide your views below:

‘Medical necessity’ is less abhorrent than “just convenient” but no adult has a right to be a parent. There are enough humans on this planet.

Please provide your views below:

I am not sure that ‘medical necessity’ can be ever be true, unless it is to create a baby who would be donor to a family member already living, and that is somewhat problematic as the donee cannot consent and the motivation to be a parent can be questioned.

Please provide your views below:

Of course the surrogate should have given birth before? How could they realise the enormity of a pregnancy and a delivery and give informed consent without this?

79 Consultation Question 71: We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

Each pregnancy carries increasing risk to mother and baby, with surrogate pregnancies proven to be higher risk than standard pregnancies, and there should be a low limit.

Chapter 15: Payments to the Surrogate: Options for Reform

80 Consultation Question 72:

Please provide your views below:

Surrogacy should not be encouraged, creating humans with the intention of taking them away from the mother who carried them for 9 months is not a public good.

109 Consultation Question 101: We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

Please provide your views below:

It seems odd that the state, and the employers of the surrogate family, should incur cost because of a choice of intended parents.

110 Consultation Question 102: We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate parent has healthcare needs and must be supported, the spouse/partner has no need to bond with a child they have pre-sold.

111 Consultation Question 103:

Please provide your views below:

The intended parents have no medical need for this and taking medicines to induce lactation is for their own benefit rather than the child's as medical traces will remain. There is no reason the employers should have to support their choices here.

112 Consultation Question 104: We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

Please provide your views below:

Pregnant women should all be supported including surrogates, Intended parents should have no such consideration.

In my experience, people who are critical of the commodification of women's bodies through, for surrogacy or prostitution, can be subjected to horrendous abuse, intimidation and threatening behaviour for their beliefs. For this reason, i almost stopped filling in this questionnaire right here. I'm sure many others did.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

(1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements, if they must be permitted at all, should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

(2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

- (1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
- (2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
- (3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

- (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,
- (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and
- (3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

1.12 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;
- (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and
- (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

- (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
- (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
- (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. * <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
- (2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
- (3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

- (1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;
- (2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and
- (3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

- (1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
- (2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

(1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:

(a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and

(b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or

(2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

(1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;

(2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and

(3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
- (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
- (2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:
 - (a) administrative, or
 - (b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
- (2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and
- (2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

- (1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and
- (2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
- (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify a measure that contravenes recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and
- (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

(1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

(3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

- (1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
- (2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
- (3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
- (4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
- (5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;
- (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
 - (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
 - (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
- (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

- (1) where his or her legal parents have consented;
- (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or
- (3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

- (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or
- (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

(2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

(a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or

(b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and

(3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

(1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or

(2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

(1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but

(2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 12.64

Consultation Question 60.

1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

- (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or
- (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

- (1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or
- (2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order. Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for a 'new pathway'. At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

- (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
- (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

- (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
- (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
- (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- (1) based on an allowance;
- (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
- (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

- (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or
- (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

- (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and
- (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

- (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
- (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
- (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

[NMN]

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

- (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or
- (2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and
- (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

- (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
- (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

- (1) no other payments;
- (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (4) lost earnings;
- (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
- (6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

- (1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;
- (2) to any miscarriage or termination; or
- (3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

- (1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and
- (2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Consultation Question 89.

1.118 We invite overseas surrogates (or bodies representing or advocating for surrogates) to share with us their experiences of international surrogacy arrangements.

N/A

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

1.119 We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

N/A

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and
- (2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

(1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and

(2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself. There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

- (1) when the child was born;
- (2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;
- (3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and
- (4) whether they are a:
 - (a) opposite-sex couple;
 - (b) male same-sex couple;
 - (c) female same-sex couple;
 - (d) single woman; or
 - (e) single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

- (1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- (2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;
- (3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and
- (4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

- (1) medical screening; and
- (2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

- (1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and
- (2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

- (1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and
- (2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:
 - (a) in the new pathway;
 - (b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or
 - (c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

- (1) their profession; and
- (2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

- (1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and
- (2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

1.154 We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

- (1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- (2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;
- (3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);
- (4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and
- (5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their ‘parents’ not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners’ ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that ‘procreative liberty’ confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a ‘surrogate.’ These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the ‘new pathway’ violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother’s choice to transfer the child “must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation.”
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government’s consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women’s and children’s human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

No

Please provide your views below:

I agree with the proposal that legal parenthood should be automatic, without the need to apply for a parental order in the UK but that recognition should be on an individual "country by country" basis to ensure protection for the welfare of the child, and against the exploitation of the surrogate.

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

11 Consultation Question 4:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Do consultees agree?

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

[REDACTED]. We are in the process of trying to conceive a child with a gestational surrogate (and now also a very close friend) who we met through the organisation. During this process we have met lots of other intended parents and surrogates at social events. We have yet to meet one person with Surrogacy UK (whether a parent through surrogacy, an intended parent, an actively looking surrogate, a former surrogate or a surrogate's partner) who does not support a change in the law so that parents automatically have legal parenthood from the birth of their child. This change in the law is essential because it reflects the wishes of everyone involved in conceiving through surrogacy - that parents have legal responsibility for their children from birth. It seems sensible that there is, as proposed, a period afterwards during which a surrogate can lodge an objection, but the default should be automatic legal parenthood for the child's parents.

15 Consultation Question 8:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Surrogacy in the UK can be a very special way to create families and, in our experience, Surrogacy UK has developed very impressive ways of making sure this works well for its surrogates and intended parents. However, there needs to be proper oversight of organisations and clinics so lessons can be learned when things go wrong and improvements can be made for future families going through surrogacy. This starts with proper and formalised collection of records and data.

Another period

Please provide your views below:

Forever - I don't see why there should be a time limit on keeping accurate records of surrogacy arrangements, as long as these are kept by a regulator and confidential details are not published outside of the organisation.

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes. The welfare of the child is most important and this should be in line with practice at UK clinics - that children born through donor-assisted conception should be able to find out identifying information as adults.

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

Yes. Restricting access to the new pathway in these cases is sensible as it promotes the importance of not using fully anonymously donated sperm and preventing a child finding out identifying information about the donor.

18 Consultation Question 11:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

This is a sensible way of ensuring wishes of surrogates and intended parents are reflected (that parental legal rights are automatic) while ensuring that surrogates have a means of objecting within a period of time that works with current rules around birth registrations.

19 Consultation Question 12:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

It makes sense that in the case of an objection by a surrogate that the pathway would revert to the current system

20 Consultation Question 13:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

These are sensible ways of ensuring that the new pathway can only be used when there are no concerns about a surrogate's consent

21 Consultation Question 14:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

With proper regulation, surrogacy arrangements should be treated like any other form of assisted reproduction - not like a fostering arrangement which requires parents to be vetted.

22 Consultation Question 15:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

It makes no sense in any situation for a surrogate's partner to be the legal parent of a child he or she is not genetically linked to, has not carried and never intended to raise.

No

Please share your views below:

As above. Even if a case falls outside of the new pathway, it makes no sense in any situation for a surrogate's partner to be the legal parent of a child he or she is not genetically linked to, has not carried and never intended to raise.

23 Consultation Question 16:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

In these tragic cases the arrangement should continue to proceed in the new pathway. With the proper regulation proposed, the surrogate's intentions will have been clear from the start - that she has no desire to be the child's parent. Forcing the intended parents and the surrogate's family to then go through a parental order process would be gratuitously painful for all involved.

Just as Surrogacy UK currently requires members to set out their wishes in wills before signing the surrogacy agreement, so regulated agencies and organisations under the new pathway should have to ensure surrogates and intended parents have clearly expressed their wishes in case of death. This should include whether the surrogate would have any objections to the arrangement continuing under the new pathway in case of death before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object.

26 Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Just as Surrogacy UK currently requires members to set out their wishes in wills before signing the surrogacy agreement, so regulated agencies and organisations under the new pathway should have to ensure surrogates and intended parents have clearly expressed their wishes in case of death. This should include whether or not they would want to be automatically registered as the child's parents on birth

Please provide your views below:

I believe 1 should be applied to reflect the wishes of the parents and the surrogate. An application should be made for the parental order so the parents could be registered as the parents and an order for a guardian to be appointed.

27 Consultation Question 20:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The provision for notice to be given should specify the ways that the second intended parent is given notice. This should not just be by post as there have been instances in the past where time limited notices by post have been sent to former addresses and not been seen in time (for instance in the case of CCJ notices issued by county courts). Email addresses and mobile phone numbers should also be included.

28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

A three parent model would not reflect the wishes of surrogates or intended parents so is a poor idea.

29 Consultation Question 22:

Please provide your views below:

It is crucial that there is proper administrative oversight, as proposed. While Surrogacy UK and some other organisations are doing a good job in difficult circumstances, it is unacceptable that these organisations are not currently regulated.

31 Consultation Question 24:

35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

Given that surrogates do not wish to be the child's parent, it does not make sense that they should retain parental responsibility from birth, even for the short period during which they could object under the new pathway. If a surrogate objected, the child would remain with the intended parents during this period so there would be no need for her to have parental responsibility. If she successfully objected, then presumably she would then have parental responsibility, as determined by the court. This seems a more logical approach, given the move to automatic recognition of legal parenthood under the proposed new regulated pathway

Chapter 9: The Regulation of Surrogacy Arrangements

37 Consultation Question 30: We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

38 Consultation Question 31: We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Please provide your views below:

39 Consultation Question 32:

Please provide your views below:

There should be a specific requirement for those involved in independent surrogacy arrangements to prove they have met the criteria required by the regulator. I agree with the Law Commission's suggestion that they could provide evidence of compliance with the regulatory requirements to an independent professional, such as a lawyer, who would then make a return on their behalf to the Authority (or a sign/witness a return they have completed themselves providing proof of compliance to avoid lawyers over-charging for a required service).

If those involved would not do this then they should have to apply for a parental order and not come under the proposed new pathway.

Allowing independent arrangements to automatically fall under the scope of the new pathway without requiring proof of compliance would undermine the work to properly regulate UK surrogacy.

I also think the issue of traditional vs gestational surrogacy here is a misleading one. In my experience, the oversight provided by the IVF clinic is minimal and insufficient (often a short counselling session or two during which the counsellor knows less about surrogacy law than the intended parents and the surrogate!). On the other hand, oversight from Surrogacy UK has been invaluable. Independent surrogacy arrangements involving IVF should also have to be endorsed in some other way to fall under the new pathway, either through membership of an agency or organisation or through completion of "evidence of compliance" paperwork, as above.

Please provide your views below:

40 Consultation Question 33:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The support we have had from Surrogacy UK has been invaluable. They have worked incredibly hard to provide a safe and supportive environment for intended parents and surrogates, with experienced staff and excellent resources to ensure members understand the law and are guided through the complexities involved with having children through surrogacy.

However, it is unacceptable that organisations like Surrogacy UK are not regulated to ensure their high standards are maintained. There is far too much scope for individuals at the organisation to control when membership applications are processed, who attends events, when information is communicated to members and lots of other little things without any oversight to ensure best practice.

42 Consultation Question 35: We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

43 Consultation Question 36: We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

Please provide your views below:

It is important that no organisation is allowed to match surrogates and intended parents for commercial gain, given the incentive this would give them to find more surrogates and pressurise them into going through with arrangements.

44 Consultation Question 37: We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

45 Consultation Question 37: We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

Yes, within the UK. However, it would be impossible to insist on this internationally for arrangements that do not fall under the new pathway!

46 Consultation Question 38: We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

Please provide your views below:

Sanctions should be criminal. This is a unique opportunity to create the best surrogacy laws in the world, promoting altruism and preventing exploitation. If regulation is to work there cannot be any tolerance for organisations that do not comply.

Those who try to match surrogates with intended parents without being regulated must face criminal sanctions to send the clearest possible message that regulation is a proper new dawn for UK surrogacy.

47 Consultation Question 39: We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

For regulation to work best, there should be a new regulator dedicated solely to overseeing surrogacy organisations and surrogacy arrangements in all their forms.

If this is impossible because of the relatively small number of surrogacy arrangements, then there should be a small branch of the HFEA with staff dedicated solely to surrogacy rather than surrogacy becoming part of the HFEA's general work.

In our experience the HFEA's forms relating to gestational surrogacy are outdated. For instance, the HFEA forms for IVF clinics do not account for gay male couples, so my husband and I repeatedly had to cross out female pronouns when filling in our clinic paperwork. Intended parents are still considered as gamete donors on forms so we had to fill in paperwork for sperm donors even though our samples were used to create embryos for our own family. This does not bode well for the organisation that is proposed to oversee surrogacy in the UK.

Additionally, as many as a third of UK surrogacy arrangements are traditional surrogacy arrangements, involving no clinics or assisted conception treatments, so it seems odd for the HFEA to regulate these arrangements.

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. 52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?

Yes

53 Consultation Question 45: We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

Surrogate-born children should be able to obtain a copy of his or her birth certificate, or identifying information about the surrogate, from the age of 18 (or non identifying information from 16, to match the age at which children born via gamete donation can apply for non-identifying information about the donor).

54 Consultation Question 46: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings. Do consultees agree?

It is important that habitual residence is allowed, as well as domicile, to allow for applications from non-domiciled individuals who live full-time in the UK. Perhaps the best way to do this would be a requirement that at least one of the intended parents has to be resident in the UK for tax purposes and has to remain resident in the UK for tax purposes for at least the following tax year.

Please provide your views below:

Given that single applicants are now allowed, there should be no requirement on couples to prove their relationship. However, there should continue to be an exclusion on two persons who are in a prohibited degree of relationship with one another from applying jointly for a parental order.

67 Consultation Question 59:

Yes

Please provide views below:

I agree with the above but medical necessity should very clearly include the unexpected death of an intended parent genetically linked to a child during pregnancy. This is very important to me and my husband. We have frozen embryos, with some genetically linked to me and some genetically linked to my husband. If a surrogate were to become pregnant with a child genetically linked to me and I died during the pregnancy, there could currently be problems with my husband becoming his child's legal parent. The same would apply with a child genetically linked to my husband if he were to die during pregnancy. In that case I could struggle to become the legal parent of my own child. The law should provide protection for this unlikely but potentially devastating scenario.

Please provide views below:

Yes, as above.

Yes

Please provide views below:

However, as above, there should be an allowance for parental orders for bereaved single applicants resident in the UK who are not genetically linked to a child born through international surrogacy in the rare event of the unexpected death of their partner who was genetically linked to the child.

68 Consultation Question 60: We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?

Yes

69 Consultation Question 61: We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner

79 Consultation Question 71: We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

However, the medical testing should assess whether the risk to the surrogate is too great if she has had many previous pregnancies

Chapter 15: Payments to the Surrogate: Options for Reform

80 Consultation Question 72:

based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

Please provide your views below:

However, the surrogate should not have to pay up front and claim expenses back from the intended parents as this could create an unfair financial burden on her and her family. It works well for the surrogate to set up a separate bank account just for surrogacy, for her to estimate expenses in advance and then for the intended parents to put set amounts of money into the account as and when needed before conception and then regularly during pregnancy. The surrogate and intended parents then have a record all payments that she has had to make clearly in one bank account's statements, as well as the receipts that the surrogate keeps for all of the expenses.

81 Consultation Question 73:

Please provide your views below:

Yes, any "unavoidable" purchases because of surrogacy should be paid by the intended parents, not the surrogate. Unavoidable purchases include any costs involved with fertility treatment, such as pre-pregnancy medical appointments, travel to and from the clinic, cycle medication and vitamins that the clinic recommends. It is important that there is understanding that travel expenses can vary. [REDACTED]

Essential costs should include all medical bills and travel related to the pregnancy, before conception, during pregnancy and afterwards. It should also include essentials during the pregnancy such as maternity clothes.

82 Consultation Question 74:

Please provide your views below:

Yes, all costs incurred by the surrogate relating to the pregnancy should be covered by intended parents.

These additional costs can include lots of different items that one might not automatically think about. For instance, pads for when she is taking certain cycle medication, such as progesterone suppositories, and replacement of underwear if needed.

Additional expenses can also include short term childcare costs [REDACTED]. If she and other friends and family were not available it would have been reasonable for us as the intended parents to pay for childcare so they could be taken to school. If this had happened over a weekend it is possible childcare might have been needed.

83 Consultation Question 75:

Please provide your views below:

Yes, I think it is fair that any costs that a surrogate faces in order to have a child for others is covered by the parents. For instance, Surrogacy UK insists on a three month "get to know" period after a surrogate asks to help intended parents. We found this period so important and spent every few weekends together, building our relationship and making sure we agreed on important and difficult questions relating to a future pregnancy, including possible grounds for a termination and our involvement in scans and the delivery. Why should the surrogate pay for, say, travel to the intended parents' home during this period when it is an important part of the process for us to have a child, or for food that we eat together during this time? We have found it absolutely right that we have paid for these costs during the getting to know period.

84 Consultation Question 76: We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

Please provide your views below:

Yes, for instance if a surrogate has to take a day off work for an appointment or a longer period for medical reasons, these loss of earnings should be paid for by the intended parents.

This should also include, where necessary, a surrogate's partner's lost earnings. For instance, in taking a week or two off work after birth to help his or her partner recover, take children to school etc

85 Consultation Question 77:

Please provide your views below:

I don't believe potential lost earnings should be included as this is subjective and impossible to define.

86 Consultation Question 78:

Please provide your views below:

87 Consultation Question 79:

Please provide your views below:

Intended parents should not pay set amounts as compensation for having to undergo medical treatments, for pain or for complications. However, they should pay for any insurance that the surrogate wishes to take out relating to the pregnancy. Most importantly, the intended parents should have to pay for a surrogate's life insurance to ensure that the surrogate's family are financially compensated in the event of death.

Please provide your views below:

No, the UK model of altruistic surrogacy should be maintained to prevent exploitation and to reflect the wishes of UK surrogates. Surrogates should not be left out of pocket because of the amazing thing they are offering to do - so all expenses should be paid. However, they should not be paid compensation for doing so as this could lead to women becoming surrogates reluctantly or through coercion. For many surrogates that I have become friends with through Surrogacy UK, being a surrogate is about helping to create a family, as well as fulfilling an ambition of their own to feel like they have achieved and given something extraordinary. Being paid for this would, for them, taint what they have done.

88 Consultation Question 80: We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

Intended parents should pay for life insurance for the surrogate during pregnancy in case of death.

89 Consultation Question 81:

Please provide your views below:

Yes, intended should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate, as they would for any friends. We have become very close to our surrogate, her husband and their children and see ourselves being close friends for life. It would make no sense for us to be banned from buying them gifts, for instance for birthdays, Christmas and anniversaries.

However, any gifts should certainly not be anything excessive that might be seen as a bribe. A provision for any gifts to be reasonable in nature is sensible.

Please provide your views below:

Yes, amendments should be made to statutory paternity leave, so that the spouse, civil partner or partner of the surrogate is entitled to leave and statutory paternity pay should also be available

111 Consultation Question 103:

Please provide your views below:

Intended parents should be entitled to parental leave like all other parents, including taking time off before birth. This may be important time for medical reasons, such as induced lactation or ante-natal appointments, but also for practical reasons, including preparing for the birth of their child and moving temporarily to an apartment near to the surrogate and her hospital so they can make sure they are at the birth.

112 Consultation Question 104: We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

Please provide your views below:

113 Consultation Question 105: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

Please provide your views below:

The consultation paper refers to maternity and paternity leave and pay, but not to shared parental leave, which is enjoyed by most couples. Intended parents should be entitled to shared parental leave, rather than adoption leave, so any time off work can be split between both parents if desired.

114 Consultation Question 106: We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

Please provide your views below:

No. Under the new pathway there would be no need for reform and this would be another reason to adhere to new regulations in order to qualify for the new pathway.

115 Consultation Question 107:

Please provide your views below:

Under the new pathway, health services should have no reason to question the legal parenthood of the intended parents or to have any concerns about the surrogacy arrangement. There should be new rules - not guidelines - setting out how medical staff should handle surrogacy cases. There could be a requirement for a surrogacy coordination meeting during which senior hospital staff are presented with the agreement that has been previously overseen by a regulated surrogacy organisation so they can be sure about the wishes of the surrogate and intended parents. A document signed by a senior hospital clinician could then be produced for the surrogate and the intended parents to keep for future appointments so midwives and doctors working at each appointment can check what has been agreed (for instance, presence at scans and during labour)

The sessions were expensive (£110 each per 60 mins) and not particularly useful in that we all clearly knew far more about surrogacy in the UK, including the legal process and other implications, than the counsellor.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

- (1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

- (2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

- (1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and
- (2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

- 1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

- 1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

- 1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

- 1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

- (1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
- (2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
- (3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

- 1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

- (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,
- (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and
- (3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

- 1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

- 1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

- 1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

- 1.12 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;
- (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and
- (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

- (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
- (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
- (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
- (2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
- (3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

- (1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;
- (2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and
- (3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

- (1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
- (2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Consultation Question 17.

- 1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

- 1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

- (1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
 - (a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
 - (b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or
- (2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

- (1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;
- (2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and
- (3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
- (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
- (2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

- (a) administrative, or
- (b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
- (2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and
- (2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

- (1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and
- (2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
- (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the ‘intended parents’ should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child’s best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women’s reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees’ views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

- (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

- 1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

- 1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

- (1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
- (2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
- (3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
- (4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
- (5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- 1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

- 1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

- 1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

- 1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

- 1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

- 1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

- 1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;
- (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
 - (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
 - (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
- (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

- 1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

- 1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

- (1) where his or her legal parents have consented;
- (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or
- (3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

- 1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

- 1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

- (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or
- (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

- (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:
 - (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or
 - (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and
- (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

- (1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or
- (2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

- 1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

- 1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

- (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but
- (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

- 1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

- 1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Consultation Question 60.

- 1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

- 1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

- (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or
- (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

- (1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or
- (2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for a 'new pathway'. At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

- (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
- (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

- (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
- (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
- (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- (1) based on an allowance;
- (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
- (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

- (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or
- (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

- (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and
- (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

- (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
- (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
- (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

- (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or
- (2) left to the parties to negotiate.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and
- (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

- (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
- (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

- (1) no other payments;
- (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (4) lost earnings;
- (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
- (6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

- (1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;
- (2) to any miscarriage or termination; or
- (3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

- (1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and
- (2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Consultation Question 89.

1.118 We invite overseas surrogates (or bodies representing or advocating for surrogates) to share with us their experiences of international surrogacy arrangements.

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

1.119 We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling

and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and
- (2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and
- (2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

- (1) when the child was born;
- (2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;
- (3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and
- (4) whether they are a:

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Consultation Question 1.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

1. all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

2. if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

- (1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and
- (2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

3. there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
4. it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
5. further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

6. entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,
7. complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and
8. met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

We provisionally propose that:

9. the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;
10. this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and
11. the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

12. the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
13. if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
14. the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

15. the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
16. if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
17. if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

(1.15.1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;

(1.15.2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and

(1.15.3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.1 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child. Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

18. the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
19. the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

20. it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
 1. for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
 2. for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or
21. the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

22. the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;
23. if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and
24. if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

We invite consultees' views as to:

25. a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
26. how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

We invite consultees' views:

27. as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
28. if so, as to whether should this oversight be:
 1. administrative, or
 2. judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

29. whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
30. if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

31. as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and
32. what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

33. the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and

34. they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

- 35. the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
- 36. if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

37. whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

38. whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

We provisionally propose that:

39. there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

40. there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

41. each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

- 42. representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
- 43. managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
- 44. ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
- 45. training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
- 46. providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We provisionally propose that:

- 47. the register should be maintained by the Authority;
- 48. the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
 - 1. identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
 - 2. non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
- 49. to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

50. where his or her legal parents have consented;

51. if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or

52. in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

53. if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or

54. if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

We provisionally propose that:

55. the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

56. the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

1. where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or
2. following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and

57. the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

We invite consultees' views on whether:

- 58. the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or
- 59. the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

- 60. should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but
- 61. that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 12.64

Consultation Question 60.

We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

62. for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or

63. for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

64. those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or

65. if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

- 66. the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
- 67. the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

- (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
- (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
- (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- 68. based on an allowance;
- 69. based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
- 70. based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

We invite consultees' views as to:

- 71. whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- 72. the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

We invite consultees' views as to:

73. whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and

74. the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

We invite consultees' views as to:

75. whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and

76. the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

77. her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or

78. other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

We invite consultees to share their experiences:

- 79. of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and
- 80. where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

81. pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
82. medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
83. specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

84. a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or

85. left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- 86. intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and
- 87. if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

- 88. any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
- 89. a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

- 90. no other payments;
- 91. essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
- 92. additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
- 93. lost earnings;

94. compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
95. gifts.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

96. in the first trimester of pregnancy only;

97. to any miscarriage or termination; or
98. some other period of time (please specify).

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

99. for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and

100. for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

N/A

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or
- (2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

We provisionally propose that:

the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parent hood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

We invite consultees' views as to whether:

101. any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and
102. if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

We invite consultees' views as to:

103. whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and
104. if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the ‘intended parents’ are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman’s health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn’t in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of ‘attractiveness’ for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people’s thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself. There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

We invite consultees’ views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the ‘intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

105. when the child was born;
106. whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;
107. whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and
108. whether they are a:
 1. opposite-sex couple;
 2. male same-sex couple;
 3. female same-sex couple;
 4. single woman; or
 5. single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

109. whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
110. whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;
111. whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and
112. the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

113. medical screening; and
 114. implications counselling
- (where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

- 115. to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and
- 116. to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

- 117. the current requirement of a genetic link; and
- 118. any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:
 - 1. in the new pathway;
 - 2. in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or
 - 3. in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

- 119. their profession; and
- 120. what they would charge to provide such a service.

N/A

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

- 121. if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and
- 122. if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

- 123. if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and
- 124. if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

- 125. whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- 126. what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;
- 127. how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);
- 128. what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and
- 129. how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

N/A

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Please provide your views below:

Ideally cases as they develop should be seen as soon as possible to avoid delay however where possible or where complex issues occur, it would be prudent to continue with a named high judge.

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

11 Consultation Question 4:

Other

Please provide your views below:

I do not understand this question.

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Do consultees agree?

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

No

Please provide your views below:

Pregnancy and Birth are huge changes and the mother should never lose her parenthood until such time that she has recovered from birth and can consent to giving up the child. The parenthood of the birthing woman must not be removed by anyone but the mother when she is of sound mind.

15 Consultation Question 8:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Records should be kept- and not amended after the fact so that the rights of the child and their health can not be compromised.

100 years; or

Please provide your views below:

100 years allows the child to live their life with reasonable amount of time to check back to these records and should such biological disorders become relevant, information can be obtained and shared to avoid harm and inadvertent inbreeding in the future.

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

This would not be in the best interests of the child. Anonymous gametes should not be utilised in surrogacy.

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

There must always be a way for the child created to track back their origins to named individuals to avoid biological and psychological harm to the child.

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

This proposal is clearly open to abuse. The postnatal period should be 6 weeks from the date of birth or 6 weeks from the date the mother regains consciousness and the responsibility of ensuring the birthing woman consents to giving the child to the prospective parents should lie with the lawyer of the prospective parents who, if they coerce the birthing woman, will lose their license. The responsibility to ensure the birthing woman fully understands what she is consenting to must be borne by a legal professional who is regulated by a legal authority so that both the child and the new mother who will be vulnerable by virtue of having given birth, are protected from abuse.

19 Consultation Question 12:

No

Please provide your views below:

The legal parent of the child at birth must remain the birthing mother until such time as documents confirming post birth acknowledgement of the surrogacy agreement are met.

Even if it is highly likely that the sperm donating surrogate parent is the biological parent, this must be proved- Not assumed.

20 Consultation Question 13:

21 Consultation Question 14:

No

Please provide your views below:

There must be a welfare assessment prior to the child being given to prospective parents to ensure their welfare is fundamental to the order being accepted.

22 Consultation Question 15:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

In this specific set of circumstances, biological parenthood must be based on the DNA of the living child.

No

As above

23 Consultation Question 16:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

In the case of the surrogate dying, they must be legally acknowledged as the surrogate birth mother and there should be notes on how the child is presumed to have been conceived prior to the prospective parents applying for care of the child.

26 Consultation Question 19:

No

Please provide your views below:

The prospective parents can only be legally acknowledged once they have been granted parental responsibility of the child. Their names should be recorded if their genetic code is assumed to have been utilised to create the child. I see no benefit to anyone of this idea.

Please provide your views below:

I agree with statement 2

27 Consultation Question 20:

Other

Please provide your views below:

After birth applications will be evaluated and if either prospective parent does not want to go ahead, they should not. Only after birth should arrangements be finalised.

28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

A 3 parent situation involving prospective parents and the surrogate may in some cases be in the best interests of the child and if the surrogate (birthing woman) agrees, this should be made possible.

If temporary, at such time the surrogate wishes to rescind their parental responsibility to the prospective parent(s), this must be agreed by all parties.

29 Consultation Question 22:

Please provide your views below:

Until well established there should be judicial overview and re-evaluation in two years as to if this new pathway works.

30 Consultation Question 23:

Please provide your views below:

I believe a social worker should be consulted in each case so that bespoke needs of each individual child are upheld as the highest priority

31 Consultation Question 24:

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Yes

I believe these records should be kept for 100 years and ALWAYS available to the child as it is in their best interest. 52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

- (1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

- (2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

- (1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and
- (2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

- 1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

- 1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

- 1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

- 1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

- (1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
- (2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
- (3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

- 1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

- (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,
- (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and
- (3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

IN PRACTICE I BELIEVE THE PROBLEMS SO MANIFEST IN ANY SYSTEM PROPOSED TO PROTECT THE VARIOUS PARTIES, THAT SURROGACY SHOULD BE MADE ILLEGAL IN THE UK.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

- 1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

- 1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

- 1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

- 1.12 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;
- (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and

- (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

- (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
- (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
- (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. * <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
- (2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
- (3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

- (1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;
- (2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and
- (3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

- (1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
- (2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

- (1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
 - (a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
 - (b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or
- (2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

- (1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;
- (2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and
- (3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
- (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
- (2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

- (a) administrative, or
- (b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
- (2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and
- (2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

- (1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and
- (2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
- (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify a measure that contravenes recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the ‘intended parents’ should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child’s best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women’s reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees’ views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

- (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

- 1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

- 1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

- (1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
- (2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
- (3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
- (4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
- (5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;
- (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
 - (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
 - (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
- (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

- 1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

- 1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

- (1) where his or her legal parents have consented;
- (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or
- (3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

- 1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

- 1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

- (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or
- (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

- (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:
 - (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or
 - (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and
- (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

- (1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or
- (2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

- (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but
- (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Consultation Question 60.

- 1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

- 1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

- (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or
- (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

- (1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or
- (2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

- (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
- (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

- (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
- (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
- (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Furthermore I believe that if surrogacy is allowed for women who have never given birth for their own children, it suggests that surrogacy is a valid 'work' choice (which it is not) further exploiting vulnerable women.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

This proposal suggests that the new pathway has been particularly ill-thought out, with scant regard being paid to the health and wellbeing of the surrogate mother or the safety and health of the baby, given that a high numbers of pregnancies risks increase for both (grand multi parity risks).

This suggestion would further normalise the idea of surrogacy as 'work' and exploit vulnerable women.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- (1) based on an allowance;
- (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
- (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

Furthermore, safeguards should be in place to ensure no mother is coerced into a surrogacy arrangement by family pressure or other means. In practice, I don't believe it is possible to actually ensure this and therefore believe surrogacy should be outlawed.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

- (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or
- (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

- (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and
- (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

- (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
- (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
- (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

- (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or
- (2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and
- (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

- (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
- (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

- (1) no other payments;
- (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (4) lost earnings;
- (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
- (6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

- (1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;

- (2) to any miscarriage or termination; or
- (3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

- (1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and
- (2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 15.99

Consultation Question 89.

1.118 We invite overseas surrogates (or bodies representing or advocating for surrogates) to share with us their experiences of international surrogacy arrangements.

N/A

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

1.119 We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

N/A

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the ‘intended parents’ to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur’s recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child’s country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the ‘intended parents’ to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur’s recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling

and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and
- (2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and
- (2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

Surrogacy should be outlawed. The impact on the NHS is not justified.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself. There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

- (1) when the child was born;
- (2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;
- (3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and
- (4) whether they are a:
 - (a) opposite-sex couple;
 - (b) male same-sex couple;
 - (c) female same-sex couple;
 - (d) single woman; or
 - (e) single man.

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

- (1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- (2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;
- (3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and
- (4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

- (1) medical screening; and
- (2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

- (1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and

- (2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

- (1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and
- (2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:
 - (a) in the new pathway;
 - (b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or
 - (c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

- (1) their profession; and
- (2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

1.153 We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

N/A

1.154 We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

- (1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- (2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;
- (3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);
- (4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and
- (5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically¹⁸ addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

I find it flawed that the consultation starts from a position of accepting that surrogacy should be legal and avoids asking any question to allow people to voice their opinions on this first, critical point. I am filling in this questionnaire as someone who has not been an intended parent or a surrogate, but I have been asked by a family member about the possibility of acting as a surrogate and therefore have considered the issues carefully and at length in a personal capacity as to how it would affect me. I am disappointed that in question 4 this is not a category that is considered to be listed out, instead only separately asking if a respondent is a surrogate. I considered that I could not act as a surrogate and on came to the strong conclusion that surrogacy should be outlawed. This is based on the fact that the downside of outlawing a very small number of arrangements that may have no obvious, immediate negative outcomes for surrogate or baby, is massively outweighed by the real and severe harm that is created by allowing surrogacy and in particular commercial surrogacy that will exploit vulnerable women and will likely have negative consequences for the baby.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Providing parental responsibility at the first appropriate step provides clarity and reassurance to both the surrogate and the intended parents. Parental responsibility is a serious obligation. Unnecessarily placing parental responsibility on the surrogate puts unnecessary stress on her, in some cases making her feel responsible for another family's child.

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. 14 Consultation Question 7:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

A common concern for many women who wish to be surrogates, is the worry that intended parents could walk away mid-pregnancy, leaving her with parental responsibility for the child. It would be profoundly immoral for intended parents to do so, but the law currently implies that they can. The law should not support immoral behaviour. The law should be amended in line with the proposals. This will protect surrogates and provide reassurance that their charitable behaviour will not expose them and their families to risk.

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Children should have an absolute right to information about their genetic parentage. Especially in the modern world of DNA testing organisations, anonymity for genetic parents is becoming almost impossible to achieve anyway. The law should therefore support the rights of children to know their ancestry, as well as not act in a way that can easily be overcome through the incoming tide of modern DNA testing.

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

Yes. Children should have an absolute right to information about their genetic parentage. Much research on families formed by adoption or gamete donation has found no negative impact on the children, except where the information is hidden and the child feels lied to. Especially in the modern world of DNA testing organisations, anonymity for genetic parents is becoming almost impossible to achieve anyway. The law should support the rights of children to know their ancestry, as this is in both the child's interests, and the long-term interests of family stability. The law should not support or encourage families who seek to withhold genetic parentage information from their children.

As proposed, where the surrogate has objected, she should continue to have parental responsibility unless a legal process changes the situation.

However, in both gestational and traditional surrogacy, the surrogate's spouse/civil (if she is in a marriage/civil partnership) partner is not a genetic parent of the child. Despite this, under current law, the surrogate's spouse/civil partner acquires parental responsibility and is named on the birth certificate. The position of the spouse/civil partner is illogical, and counter to what most people would believe the birth certificate should show. The spouse/civil partner is not responsible for the surrogate's decision to help another couple create a family - she is a capable woman able to make her own decisions. The intended parents have clearly greater responsibility for the decisions around bringing the baby into the world than the spouse/civil partner. Therefore the spouse/civil partner should not automatically be held to have parental responsibility for the child created as a result of those decisions.

There is an argument that important safeguards are created by enabling the surrogate to remain as legal parent, unless a legal process changes that status, even in the case of gestational surrogacy. That argument does not apply to her spouse/civil partner. Therefore an alternative option, in addition to the proposals, is to enable the intended parent, where they are the genetic father, to have parental responsibility and be named on the birth certificate as the father in all cases. This preserves the safeguards the surrogate requires, provides clear information to the child on their genetic parentage, and avoids placing parental responsibility on the spouse/civil partner where this does not align with the moral responsibility for the birth.

No

Similar answer as above. The spouse/civil partner is not responsible for the surrogate's decision to help another couple create a family - she is a capable woman able to make her own decisions. Moral responsibility for the child is more attributable to the intended parents than the surrogate's spouse/civil partner. The spouse/civil partner should not automatically be held to have parental responsibility for the child created as a result of decisions by other people. Holding them to have parental responsibility is counter to what most people would believe the outcome should be.

The intended parent, where they are the genetic father, should be named on the birth certificate as the father. Whilst preserving safeguards for the surrogate, this provides clear information to the child on their genetic parentage and avoids placing parental responsibility on the spouse/civil partner.

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth. 26 Consultation Question 19:

I agree with the proposals, with an addition that the proposed written surrogacy agreement required under the new pathway, should require a section on who the intended parents wish to look after the child in the event of their death during pregnancy. As this will form part of the agreement that all parties will have received advice on, it will help avoid any conflict between the surrogate and the intended parents' families at what will be an incredibly emotional time. It will also be an invaluable record for any court needing to adjudicate on who who should have parental responsibility for the child in these circumstances.

Please provide your views below:

Whichever outcome is chosen should respect the child's right to knowledge of their genetic parentage, and not encourage or enable blocks to the child exercising that right. Therefore care needs to be exercised to ensure that there are no loopholes through which the existence of the surrogacy arrangements (and donor gametes if needed) is hidden.

So long as an independent surrogacy arrangement can abide by the checks and requirements of the new pathway, there is no good reason to exclude them. It would be great to provide a specific listed responsibility for the responsible individual to consider the needs of any children born through a surrogacy arrangement when operating the organisation. This is implicit in the current requirements, but making it explicit would assist demonstrating clarity of focus of these organisations.

Please provide your views below:

There is a tendency for regulatory bodies to over-require specific levels of qualifications, even where there is no evidence those levels of qualifications lead to greater competence. There is currently no qualification that provides the skill set needed to operate a surrogacy organisation, therefore there is no qualification that is relevant.

There should, instead, be relevant dis-barring requirements. These should be based on the same dis-barring requirements for working with vulnerable adults and children (e.g. enhanced criminal records checks etc.).

46 Consultation Question 38: We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

Please provide your views below:

It depends on the nature of the term "matching and facilitation". It is a common experience in independent surrogacy arrangements for a surrogate to be introduced to the concept by a joint friend/family member of the intended parents. Essentially the intended parents discuss with friends and family members that they are considering surrogacy, one of those friends/family members discusses the situation with other people, and one of those other people wishes to help the intended couple. Care should be exercised to make sure that friends and family members would not fall into the definition of providing a regulated service, when they are just carrying out normal day-to-day gossip and/or introducing one friend to another. A provision should remove any obligation on regulatory requirements where the person involved has only "matched" intended parents to a surrogate in a one-off scenario, where those parties were already known to the person.

47 Consultation Question 39: We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood. 48 Consultation Question 40: We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms). Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

There are good arguments why the agreement should be unenforceable. However it is extremely unusual to create voluntary legal agreements, entered into freely by both parties, that only bind in one direction. To do so risks creating a strong imbalance in the relationship between the parties. Intended parents have often been through very emotionally challenging experiences (e.g. traumatic medical or fertility treatment). They are potentially at risk if put into a strongly imbalanced relationship.

49 Consultation Question 41: We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Impartial advice when working through a surrogacy arrangement is invaluable. Organisations providing advice and support to intended parents and surrogates help prevent anyone being taken advantage of, and ensure appropriate behaviour. There are voluntary organisations carrying out good work, but the existence of professional services in this field should also be encouraged.

50 Consultation Question 42: We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Children should always have a right to information on their genetic parentage. The original birth certificate should therefore, where possible, record the genetic parentage of the child. Legal parentage and parental responsibility can be demonstrated by a later process. However birth certificates should provide clarity to the child as to the circumstances of their birth.

Please provide your views below:

Absolutely agree with the rights of surrogate-born children to establish whether they have a family relationship with another people before they get intimate. It is common, but not 100%, for surrogates to remain close to the families they have helped. It is therefore common for surrogate-born children to feel close to their surrogate and the surrogate's family. They would therefore wish to know whether a person they were becoming intimate with, was part of that extended family.

59 Consultation Question 51:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Children should have an absolute right to knowledge of their genetic relationships - the law should not enable the withholding of this information. It is always possible that genetic siblings/half-siblings may not both want to stay in touch once they know about each other. However that is the same as any family and is a decision each sibling/half-sibling can take once they know of the existence of the other.

Please provide your views below:

It is common, but not 100%, for surrogates to remain close to the families they have helped. It is therefore common for surrogate-born children to feel close to their surrogate and the surrogate's family. It is therefore possible for one surrogate-born child to know their surrogate, but not any other children that same surrogate may have born. They deserve the right to know about that extended family of surrogate-born children.

This is a similar answer as to finding out about other surrogate-born children that the child is genetically related to / related to through being born of the same surrogate. Whilst there is the argument that the child of the surrogate is in a separate category, they are all children born of the same mother. They have a right to know about each other.

69 Consultation Question 61: We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide views below:

I do not agree with the assumption in the question: that the breakdown in the relationship of the intended parents would result in one not acquiring parental responsibility. Both of the intended parents were involved in commissioning the surrogacy arrangement and both should be responsible for the child's welfare. An intended parent who no longer wishes to be present should be treated in law as any parent who abandons their family - e.g. court orders for maintenance/ contact/ etc.

70 Consultation Question 62:

Please provide your views below:

Whilst supportive of the requirement to prevent 'social surrogacy' (no matter how unlikely), using the phrase "medical necessity" will create the potential for future conflict and misunderstanding of the regulation (e.g. around gay couples). The consultation document also uses the phrase "biological or medically unable to carry and deliver a healthy baby". Switching to using this phrasing would provide clarity and include all potential couples the definition is wished to cover.

Please provide your views below:

Assessment should be brief and require the certification of a relevant medical professional. It will usually be straightforward for the medical professional to make this statement without further investigation (e.g. with a gay male couple it would be extremely straightforward, with a woman already treated for infertility it would require a brief read of her medical notes).

To ease the process, the certification should be able to be provided by the clinic providing the fertility services.

It is considered good practice among current surrogacy organisations for surrogates to have "completed their own family" before becoming a surrogate. This is because any pregnancy can go badly wrong and result in the infertility of the mother. It would be profoundly wrong for a surrogate to lose the ability to have her own children, by carrying a child for someone else. Therefore in addition to a minimum age requirement, consideration should be given to the requirement for the surrogate to declare she has completed her own family / has considered the potential for an impact on her own future ability to have children

I appreciate that making this a requirement is an intrusion into the rights of the surrogate to make her own decisions over her own body. However it is a practical requirement that some organisations already operate, given how very sensitive most people involved in surrogacy are to the risk of infertility.

Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

I agree that the surrogate and intended parents require advice. However it depends on the definition of "legal". Many intended parents at present do not receive individualised advice from a legally-qualified individual. This is sufficient as the law around the surrogacy agreement can be discussed by a competent employee / volunteer at a surrogacy organisation using standard factsheets. Imposing the requirement for an in-person briefing from a legally-qualified individual would increase costs to all parties without necessarily improving the awareness of the individuals.

78 Consultation Question 70: We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

Similar to the response to Consultation Question 65, many surrogacy organisations operate the requirement that the surrogate has already completed their own family. This is to prevent the surrogacy potentially ending her ability to have children of her own, should the pregnancy go badly wrong. This alternative requirement will both prevent surrogacy threatening the ability of surrogates to create their own families, and also reduce the risk of a surrogacy arrangements causing harm to women (as those most likely to experience harm will have already experienced it during their own pregnancy).

There is always the possibility of a new medical concern arising, especially with surrogates who wish to remain child-free themselves, and carry a surrogate baby as their first pregnancy. However the ability for women to chose to help other in a way that puts themselves at risk is a key element of personal choice.

79 Consultation Question 71: We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

So long as a woman is medically safe to carry out a surrogacy, and chooses to help people that way, there is no benefit to regulation stopping her from carrying out her wishes. She is clearly the best person to decide on what she chooses to do with her own body.

113 Consultation Question 105: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

There is the possibility that providing full access to maternity/paternity pay and leave to both the surrogate and her partner, and to both the intended parents, risks public support for surrogacy. This is especially in the light of potential increases in maternity/ paternity/ shared parental leave. The perception may occur that surrogacy places an unfair burden on the colleagues of a surrogate, especially a surrogate who assists multiple intended parents, when this burden is triggered by the intended parents (who are unlikely to work for the same organisation as the surrogate).

Resolving this concern would require a detailed consideration of the options available to ensure that intended parents do not impose unfair costs on wider society through surrogacy. However the need to consider this situation will grow as the number of surrogate pregnancies continues to grow.

123 Consultation Question 115:

Please provide your views below:

The proposals would neither increase nor decrease accessibility, in terms of our ability to have children, as we are already involved in the process. However, but providing greater clarity to all involved, the new pathway will significantly reduce concerns held by surrogates / potential surrogates. This is a significant benefit of itself. It may also increase the number of women who are willing to be surrogates, however the benefit to surrogate peace-of-mind is worth achieving irrespective of whether it increase the number of women willing to be surrogates.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

- (1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

- (2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

- 1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

- 1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:
- (1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
 - (2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
 - (3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

- 1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:
- (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,
 - (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and

(3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

- 1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

- 1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

- 1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

- 1.12 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;

- (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and
- (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

- (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
- (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
- (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. * <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
- (2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
- (3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

- (1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;
- (2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and
- (3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

- (1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
- (2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

- 1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

- 1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

- (1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
 - (a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
 - (b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or
- (2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

- (1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;
- (2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and
- (3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
- (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
- (2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

- (a) administrative, or
- (b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
- (2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and
- (2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

- (1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and
- (2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
- (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify a measure that contravenes recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the ‘intended parents’ should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child’s best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women’s reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees’ views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

- (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

- 1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

- 1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

- (1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
- (2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
- (3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
- (4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
- (5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- 1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

- 1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

- 1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

- 1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

- 1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

- 1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

- 1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;
- (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
 - (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
 - (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
- (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

- 1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

- 1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

- (1) where his or her legal parents have consented;
- (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or
- (3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

- 1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

- 1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

- (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or
- (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

- (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:
 - (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or
 - (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and
- (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

- (1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or
- (2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

- 1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

- 1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

- (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but
- (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

- 1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

- 1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Consultation Question 60.

- 1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

- 1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

- (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or
- (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

- (1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or
- (2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for a 'new pathway'. At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

- (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
- (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

- (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
- (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
- (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- (1) based on an allowance;
- (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
- (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

- (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or
- (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

- (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and
- (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

- (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
- (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
- (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

- (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or
- (2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother compensation.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and
- (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

- (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
- (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

- (1) no other payments;
- (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (4) lost earnings;
- (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
- (6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

- (1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;

- (2) to any miscarriage or termination; or
- (3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

- (1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and
- (2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 15.99

Consultation Question 89.

1.118 We invite overseas surrogates (or bodies representing or advocating for surrogates) to share with us their experiences of international surrogacy arrangements.

N/A

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

1.119 We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

N/A

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling

and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and
- (2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and
- (2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit.

There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

- (1) when the child was born;
- (2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;
- (3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and
- (4) whether they are a:
 - (a) opposite-sex couple;
 - (b) male same-sex couple;
 - (c) female same-sex couple;
 - (d) single woman; or
 - (e) single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

- (1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- (2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;
- (3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and
- (4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

- (1) medical screening; and
- (2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

- (1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and

- (2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

- (1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and
- (2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:
 - (a) in the new pathway;
 - (b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or
 - (c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

- (1) their profession; and
- (2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

N/A

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

1.153 We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

- (1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

- (2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

1.154 We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

- (1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and
- (2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

- (1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- (2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;
- (3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);
- (4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and
- (5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

No

Please provide your views below:

I think international arrangements via a permitted country should be allowed for within a standard parental order process and incur the same costs for fairness. If the ip's use a non permitted country then maybe the high court with additional checks is needed

Please provide your views below:

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

The current parental order process in practice is perfectly adequate with the current level of judiciary judges, I have been through 3 parental orders as a surrogate

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Please provide your views below:

11 Consultation Question 4:

No

Please provide your views below:

No, parental responsibility should only be awarded once the parental order checks and processes are complete whether that be before or post birth

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The process should always be open and transparent to those involved

13 Consultation Question 6:

Please provide your views below:

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Absolutely! The legalities should be complete before the birth so that the child is born into a secure legal position with no question over who the parents are and who holds the legal and/or moral rights. This would make life considerably easier for both families and the health professionals involved in the pregnancy, birth and post birth care.

15 Consultation Question 8:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Another period

Please provide your views below:

I think 25 years or maybe 30 would be long enough so that the child born through surrogacy can gain access to the records should they choose to. 100 years seems excessive for holding such personal data

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

I do not agree with any anonymous donation of eggs or sperm or embryos. Every human deserves to know, at their choice, what their genetic roots are

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

Same reply as q.16

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

A parental order should be applied for and completed before the birth and once granted, before the birth, there is no right for the surrogate to change her mind. It is not her child at any point during a surrogacy arrangement and this needs to be reflected in law. I as a surrogate do not want the legal responsibility of the child at any point, my legal rights are over my body not over the baby.

19 Consultation Question 12:

No

Please provide your views below:

If the surrogate wishes to object then she can do so but it should be that the surrogate has to fight to gain legal responsibility from the intended parents not that the intended parents have to fight to gain the legal responsibility from the surrogate. At the point of the surrogate signing and committing to a surrogacy agreement/arrangement (before conception of a surrogate baby takes places) the legal rights of the intended parents should be recognised and the surrogate signing is her agreeing she has no legal rights over the conceived child

Please provide your views below:

21 Consultation Question 14:

Other

Please provide your views below:

Any welfare assessment should be carried out on the same basis as if the baby was born to the intended parents naturally without any surrogacy arrangement. The parental order should be completed during the pregnancy and once granted the intended parents should be treated exactly the same as any other parent who had conceived carried and birthed their baby

22 Consultation Question 15:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The surrogates partner in whatever situation, married or otherwise should never be recognised in a legal capacity. It is not their child in any way

No

Please share your views below:

As per q.22. My husband hated that he was legal seen as the child's father. He found it weird and upsetting, he didn't want the responsibility or legal implications for a child that was another mans!!

23 Consultation Question 16:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

In any and all circumstances the intended parents are the parents biologically and morally and the signing of a surrogacy agreement before conception should define that even if a parental order process hasn't been completed by the time of a still birth

Yes

Please provide your views below:

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

Another reason why the surrogacy agreement before conception should be legally binding. It would avoid complications should the surrogate die at any point

26 Consultation Question 19:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Yes and the wills drawn up before conception alongside the surrogacy agreement should stipulate the legal guardians should the intended parents die and should be legally enforced

Yes

Please provide your views below:

28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

No the surrogate is a surrogate. She is not an intended parent in any capacity and should not have legal rights over the baby only her body

35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?

Chapter 9: The Regulation of Surrogacy Arrangements

37 Consultation Question 30: We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Surrogacy is surrogacy whether one or both of the parents are biologically related. I believe surrogacy with donor embryos should also be treated the same as the arrangement entered into is still on a surrogacy basis

38 Consultation Question 31: We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Please provide your views below:

I have carried a gestational surrogate baby and two traditional surrogate babies. The appropriate health screening, counselling and legal advice took place. It was in a less formal manner and arranged ourselves rather than via a clinic but it was simple and easy to do. I had support and guidance via my independent groups and surrogate and intended parent friends through the surrogacy community who held vast amounts of direct personal experience, much more than any professional working in a clinic had

39 Consultation Question 32:

Please provide your views below:

Yes of course! A surrogacy arrangement is a surrogacy arrangement and the law has to be fair and equal to all

Please provide your views below:

Everyone in the land has to follow whatever laws are set out. As long as the guidance and relevant forms and process are detailed with easy access on the government website just like the current parental order process is. There should continue to be no need for a lawyer to be involved to keep the costs low and make surrogacy as accessible as possible

40 Consultation Question 33:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Any organisations should be regulated and a surrogacy one given its nature should definitely be regulated. I know of so much bad behaviour that has occurred within all of the current surrogacy organisations, hence I became an independent surrogate, there is a desperate need for regulation representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;; managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;; ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;; training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and, providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

42 Consultation Question 35: We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

We do not want to become like America. We do not want agencies. We want organisations who provide guidance and support and who uphold the legal and moral practices that should occur for altruistic surrogacy. The costs have to be kept low for intended parents to make surrogacy accessible and also to stop surrogacy becoming a business transaction.

43 Consultation Question 36: We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

Please provide your views below:

A supportive community in which surrogates and intended parents can be educated on best practice for a safe journey and also meet those on both sides to form friendships that may lead to matching. Advertising should be allowed alongside a law in which surrogacy is kept altruistic

44 Consultation Question 37: We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

Independent surrogacy and the independent community is a perfectly legitimate way of pursuing surrogacy. It keeps costs low making surrogacy more accessible and it allows freedom of choice and stops organisations playing god with people. The law should be clear enough that an organisation is not necessary but just an option that may suit some people in their journey.

45 Consultation Question 37: We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

46 Consultation Question 38: We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

Please provide your views below:

There would have to be clear definitions of what an organisation would be defined as within surrogacy. An independent Facebook group for example can offer everything an organisation can but they are run by people who are currently or have pursued surrogacy and set it up for like minded people to meet and gain information and support with no payment involved but more as an interest group. Would someone advertising in that group and a match coming about then make the group an organisation even though no money was involved? I think where fees have to be paid yes that should be regulated and if they break any laws it should be criminal but it will have to be very clear what constitutes an organisation as to not impact negatively or confusingly on independent groups and independent surrogacy

47 Consultation Question 39: We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Please provide your views below:

48 Consultation Question 40: We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms). Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

A surrogacy agreement should be enforceable and the basis of the parental order

49 Consultation Question 41: We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

There should be fees for joining an organisation but that should include any help support or guidance for negotiating facilitating and advising else the organisation are just adding costs on top and becoming a profit making organisation and will basically be an agency and we are then on the slippery slope of becoming like the American surrogacy model

50 Consultation Question 42: We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

There should be no way that the intended parents can hide the origin of the baby's birth. Every human deserves to know how they came to be

53 Consultation Question 45: We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

Please provide your views below:

I want to see recognition of both the intended parents upon registration, the surrogate should be recorded but as a surrogate not as parent 1 and the surrogate's husband or partner should never be allowed on the birth certificate

54 Consultation Question 46: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings. Do consultees agree?

Yes

56 Consultation Question 48: We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

Please provide your views below:

The information should be identifying. The child should have access to those involved in giving them life should they choose to access it. It's vital for good mental health

It should be 18 for everything

Please provide your views below:

No they should have access to everything upon 18 and not before. If the parents were to consent under 18 then they can just tell them the information themselves

58 Consultation Question 50: We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

Yes they should be able to access that information

59 Consultation Question 51:

61 Consultation Question 53: For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Please provide your views below:

No. If they are not part of a granted parental order then they don't go on the register unless they are genetically related

Chapter 11: Eligibility Criteria for a Parental Order

62 Consultation Question 54: We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished. Do consultees agree?

Please provide your views below:

Yes. The parental order should have to be completed by 24 weeks gestation ie when the baby is classed as viable for life

Please provide views below:

No the law should be the same for domestic and international

68 Consultation Question 60: We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?

Please provide your views below:

69 Consultation Question 61: We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

There should be no specific limit. It should be determined during the parental order process whether the intended parents are fit in every way and age should not be a stand alone barrier

Other

Please provide your views below:

I think the minimum age should be 25. Surrogacy is hard and can be expensive and requires real grounding in the lives of those involved. To think an 18 year old can pursue surrogacy as a surrogate or intended parent is madness

Please provide your views below:

Sti's checks should be required by law

75 Consultation Question 67:

Other

Please provide your views below:

Yes but only for a first journey and the counsellor should have direct experience of being an intended parent or surrogate. My previous counselling sessions were completely pointless and I ended up educating the counsellor as they have no experience. The best counselling I got was always through my experienced friends in the surrogacy community. You just can't understand and truly discuss the ins and outs with people who haven't been there and done that. The whole process is a purely emotional one and a counsellor needs to understand that and it can only be gained by experience

76 Consultation Question 68: We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed. Do consultees agree?

Other

Please provide your views below:

Yes but the legal advice can be gained from research of the relevant government web pages and the surrogacy act. It should not have to be paid for or specifically from a lawyer as long as proof can be shown of the research

77 Consultation Question 69:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Please provide your views below:

Offences on the current barring list should be preventative

78 Consultation Question 70: We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

No. It is a risk that all involved take and whether she has given birth before or not doesn't mean the next birth will go well or not. You just never know with pregnancy and birth and it's a risk you take. However a surrogate should always be able to say she has completed her family and if she has no children yet she should be comfortable with the idea that the surrogacy pregnancy could be her one and only.

79 Consultation Question 71: We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

As long as she is medically cleared to carry again by her gp then there should be no specific limit on pregnancies

Chapter 15: Payments to the Surrogate: Options for Reform

80 Consultation Question 72:

based on an allowance;

Please provide your views below:

Expenses is complex. You cannot provide a receipt for a lot of expenses incurred. The accounting side of things would require a level of intelligence and time dedication and ultimately a loss of money for many surrogates as they'd just let many expenses slide due to how complicated it would be to produce a receipt for every penny. Also the sum has to set out before conception so intended parents can budget which is based on an informed guesstimate. You just cannot say specifically how much will be spent or on what. A reasonable amount should be agreed with flexibility for more in the case of the unexpected or complications. It's about working as a team and a mindset that the surrogate is never out of pocket. Also what some will deem a vital expense others will not ask for. As long as all are comfortable with the amount paid then it should be no one else's business

81 Consultation Question 73:

Please provide your views below:

See q.80. The list is too extensive and individual to detail. One pregnancy will incur costs that another will not

82 Consultation Question 74:

Please provide your views below:

Additional would be things like a recuperation family break, activities for the surrogates children, holistic therapies, post birth gym membership or classes, post birth clothing. Anything linked to the pregnancy and additional things to make it a positive experience for all including the surrogates family are just as essential as loss of earnings and maternity clothes and travel costs. The mental as well as the physical health needs to be taken care of

83 Consultation Question 75:

Please provide your views below:

Yes intended parents should cover the cost of everything. What the surrogate is doing for them is priceless and even with high expenses it doesn't equate to even near to the national minimum wage for effectively working 24/7 for 10 months! A surrogate should never be out of pocket or adversely effected financially

84 Consultation Question 76: We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

Please provide your views below:

Intended parents shouldn't have to pay maternity pay or sickness pay if the surrogates it through her employer. They should pay the difference between the maternity pay and her usual wage so she doesn't have a drop in income

85 Consultation Question 77:

Please provide your views below:

86 Consultation Question 78:

Please provide your views below:

Social security benefits do not understand a surrogates expenses so they try to take it as income. It purely depends on who you speak to on the end of the phone to whether they class it as income or not. This causes surrogates to hide their expenses and have a fear of being caught out and getting in trouble which is disgraceful. The current law classes a surrogates expenses as expenses and not income but it's not clear enough and it needs to be defined properly either way pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;; medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or, specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

87 Consultation Question 79:

Please provide your views below:

Yes absolutely. Anyone who has experienced complications on pregnancy or just been through a tough pregnancy and birth will know how awful it can be! Hence why 99% of women won't be a surrogate!!

Please provide your views below:

left to the parties to negotiate.

Please provide your views below:

As long as everyone is clear and translates him and details their financial expectations for specific complications then it is up to them to decide what they are comfortable with and whether to proceed. It's too individual and personal for a regulatory body to define specific amounts as it depends on the surrogates circumstances with work and kids and other responsibilities and what she feels is appropriate

88 Consultation Question 80: We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

Please provide your views below:

Intended parents should always cover the cost of life insurance for this purpose and it's not expensive

89 Consultation Question 81:

Please provide your views below:

Absolutely they should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate and their family. It's a huge thing the surrogate is doing for them, she is gifting them a child and a family!! If the parents want to show their appreciation why should the law stop that

90 Consultation Question 82:

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

Please provide your views below:

There should not be a payment for service. Covering costs, treating the surrogate and making sure she and her family are comfortable and stress free is vital but it shouldn't go as far as a payment for service

Please provide views below:

Payments should always in any circumstances be made in periodic sums and never in full up front and all payments made by birth excluding birth and post birth complications which should be made before leaving hospital. 109 Consultation Question 101: We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate's partner should get normal paternity leave like the surrogate gets normal maternity. She has just given birth, potentially by c section, she more than likely has her own kids, she needs her partner at home to help while she recovers exactly the same as with her own baby. The recovery is usual much quicker as there isn't a new born to look after but she has still gone through a massive physical trauma and she may need help and support from an emotional point of view too as hormones post birth are intense 110 Consultation Question 102: We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

Intended parents should get the same as any other parent and should not be treated differently

111 Consultation Question 103:

Intended parents should be able to take their maternity and paternity leave exactly the same as any other expectant parent so if they wish to leave when their surrogate is 36 weeks or whatever then they can do so the same as the surrogate can

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

- (1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

- (2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

- (1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and
- (2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

- 1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

- 1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

- 1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

- 1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

- (1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
- (2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
- (3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

- 1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

- (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,
- (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and
- (3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I very much disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

1.12 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;
- (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and
- (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

- (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
- (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
- (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
- (2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
- (3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

- (1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;
- (2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and
- (3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

- (1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
- (2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Consultation Question 17.

- 1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

- 1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

- (1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
 - (a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
 - (b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or
- (2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

- (1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;
- (2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and
- (3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
- (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
- (2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

- (a) administrative, or
- (b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
- (2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and
- (2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

- (1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and
- (2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
- (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify a measure that contravenes recommendations of

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the ‘intended parents’ should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child’s best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women’s reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees’ views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

- (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

- 1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

- 1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

- (1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
- (2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
- (3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
- (4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
- (5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;
- (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
 - (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
 - (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
- (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

- 1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

- 1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

- (1) where his or her legal parents have consented;
- (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or
- (3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

- 1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

- 1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

- (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or
- (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

- (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:
 - (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or
 - (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and
- (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

- (1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or
- (2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

- (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but
- (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Consultation Question 60.

1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

- (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or
- (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

- (1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or
- (2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

- (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
- (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

- (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
- (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
- (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- (1) based on an allowance;
- (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
- (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

- (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or
- (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

- (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and
- (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

- (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
- (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
- (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

- (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or
- (2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and
- (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

- (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
- (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

- (1) no other payments;
- (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (4) lost earnings;
- (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
- (6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

- (1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;
- (2) to any miscarriage or termination; or
- (3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

- (1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and
- (2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 15.99

Consultation Question 89.

1.118 We invite overseas surrogates (or bodies representing or advocating for surrogates) to share with us their experiences of international surrogacy arrangements.

N/A

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

1.119 We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

N/A

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the ‘intended parents’ to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur’s recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child’s country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the ‘intended parents’ to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur’s recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling

and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and
- (2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and
- (2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other countries.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

- (1) when the child was born;
- (2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;
- (3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and
- (4) whether they are a:

 - (b) male same-sex couple;
 - (c) female same-sex couple;
 - (d) single woman; or
 - (e) single man.

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

- (1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- (2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;
- (3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and
- (4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

- (1) medical screening; and
- (2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

- (1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and

- (2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

- (1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and
- (2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:
 - (a) in the new pathway;
 - (b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or
 - (c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

- (1) their profession; and
- (2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

1.153 We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

- (1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

- (2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

1.154 We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

- (1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

- (1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- (2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;
- (3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);
- (4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and
- (5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

- (1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

- (2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

- (1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and
- (2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Consultation Question 3.

- 1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

- 1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

- 1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

- 1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

- (1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
- (2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
- (3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

- 1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

- (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,
- (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and
- (3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

- 1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

- 1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

- 1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

- 1.12 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;
- (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and
- (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

- (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
- (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
- (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
- (2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
- (3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

- (1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;
- (2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and
- (3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

- (1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
- (2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Consultation Question 17.

- 1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

- 1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

- (1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
 - (a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
 - (b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or
- (2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

- (1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;
- (2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and
- (3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
- (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
- (2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

- (a) administrative, or
- (b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
- (2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and
- (2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

- (1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and
- (2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
- (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the ‘intended parents’ should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child’s best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women’s reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees’ views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

- (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

- 1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

- 1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

- (1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
- (2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
- (3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
- (4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
- (5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- 1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

- 1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

- 1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

- 1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

- 1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

- 1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

- 1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;
- (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
 - (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
 - (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
- (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

- 1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

- 1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

- (1) where his or her legal parents have consented;
- (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or
- (3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

- 1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

- 1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

- (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or
- (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

- (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:
 - (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or
 - (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and
- (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

- (1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or
- (2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

- 1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

- 1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

- (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but
- (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

- 1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

- 1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Consultation Question 60.

- 1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

- 1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

- (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or
- (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

- (1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or
- (2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

- 1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

- 1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

- (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
- (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

- 1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

- (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
- (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
- (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- (1) based on an allowance;
- (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
- (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

- (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or
- (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

- (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and
- (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

- (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
- (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
- (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

- (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or
- (2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and
- (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

- (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
- (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

- (1) no other payments;
- (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (4) lost earnings;
- (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
- (6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

- (1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;
- (2) to any miscarriage or termination; or
- (3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

- (1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and
- (2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 15.99

Consultation Question 89.

1.118 We invite overseas surrogates (or bodies representing or advocating for surrogates) to share with us their experiences of international surrogacy arrangements.

N/A

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

1.119 We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling

and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and
- (2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and
- (2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

- (1) when the child was born;
- (2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;
- (3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and
- (4) whether they are a:
 - (a) opposite-sex couple;
 - (b) male same-sex couple;
 - (c) female same-sex couple;
 - (d) single woman; or
 - (e) single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

- (1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- (2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;
- (3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and
- (4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

- (1) medical screening; and
- (2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

- (1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and

- (2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Chapter 6: The parental order procedure

8 Consultation Question 1:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

This situation is prone to trafficking and needs the highest scrutiny.

Please provide your views below:

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

Lay justice as at present with referral in contentious cases.

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Please provide your views below:

11 Consultation Question 4:

No

Please provide your views below:

The court should proceed at the pace it sees fit without undue pressure to force a decision.

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

No

Please provide your views below:

Automatic legal registration of the adoptive parents puts undue pressure on the birth mother to surrender her child.

15 Consultation Question 8:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Another period

Please provide your views below:

300 years would seem a reasonable period for the purpose of researching family trees.

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Children have a right to know their biological heritage.

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

Please provide your views below:

No anonymous sperm should be allowed. Not living with your biological father is enough of a disadvantage to a child, without anonymous sperm. I have a client born via sperm donor who finds the problem distressing and it promotes identity and relationship confusion.

18 Consultation Question 11:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The objection period should reflect the needs of the birth mother and baby, not court process. This period of time for the mother to make up her mind should be established in consultation with psychologists and women's groups.

19 Consultation Question 12:

No

Please provide your views below:

If the birth mother decides to keep her child the intended parents should not be able to apply to take the child from her. If one of the intended parents has provided gametes the court should decide on access arrangements.

20 Consultation Question 13:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

If the surrogate has not provided positive consent at this point it might be assumed she is exercising her right to keep her baby.

21 Consultation Question 14:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

1) The welfare of the baby should always be assessed. All babies suffer from the break of the maternal bond if they are removed from their birth mother.

22 Consultation Question 15:

No

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate's spouse should be able to adopt the child. If an intended parent provided gametes that parent could be awarded access rights by the court.

Yes

Please share your views below:

23 Consultation Question 16:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

2) surrogate should decide.

Other

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate should decide.

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate should decide.

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

The court must decide.

26 Consultation Question 19:

No

Please provide your views below:

What is the point? That's gaslighting the baby. The intended parents are neither biological nor social parents so have no business laying claim to the child posthumously.

Please provide your views below:

2

The surrogate should decide on possible adoption.

27 Consultation Question 20:

No

Please provide your views below:

Single people should not be able to use surrogates. The child is already at a disadvantage of not having its biological mother, so at least 2 loving parents are needed, preferably an extended biological family to provide role models too.

28 Consultation Question 21: We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

Please provide your views below:

Temporary may confuse the child. Permanent access of the birth mother would be better for the child.

29 Consultation Question 22:

Please provide your views below:

B judicial

If it isn't working legal powers are required.

30 Consultation Question 23:

Please provide your views below:

Yes the court should demand information and conditions it sees fit.

31 Consultation Question 24:

Please provide your views below:

Yes the court should have additional rights.

32 Consultation Question 25: We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Please provide your views below:

No

33 Consultation Question 26:

No

Please provide your views below:

The court should decide if the intended parents are fit.

34 Consultation Question 27:

No

Please provide your views below:

At birth it's much too early for the birth mother to decide.

35 Consultation Question 28: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?

Yes

A list of approved organisations should be available.

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

The child should be able to access their birth certificate at age 16. Early applications could be made if social workers become involved with the family. Loss of biological heritage is a huge unconscious trauma for a child.

52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. 103 Consultation Question 95: We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child. Do consultees agree?

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

- (1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

- (2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

- (1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and
- (2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

- 1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

- 1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

- 1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

- 1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

- (1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
- (2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
- (3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

- 1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

- (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,
- (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and
- (3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

- 1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

- 1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

- 1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

- 1.12 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;
- (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and
- (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

- (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
- (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
- (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
- (2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
- (3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

- (1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;
- (2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and
- (3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

- (1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
- (2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Consultation Question 17.

- 1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

- 1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

- (1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
 - (a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
 - (b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or
- (2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

- (1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;
- (2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and
- (3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
- (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
- (2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

- (a) administrative, or
- (b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
- (2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and
- (2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

- (1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and
- (2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
- (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the ‘intended parents’ should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child’s best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women’s reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees’ views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

- (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

- 1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

- 1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

- (1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
- (2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
- (3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
- (4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
- (5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- 1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

- 1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

- 1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

- 1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

- 1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

- 1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

- 1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;
- (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
 - (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
 - (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
- (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

- 1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

- 1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

- (1) where his or her legal parents have consented;
- (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or
- (3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

- 1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

- 1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

- (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or
- (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

- (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:
 - (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or
 - (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and
- (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

- (1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or
- (2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

- 1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

- 1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

- (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but
- (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

- 1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

- 1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Consultation Question 60.

- 1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

- 1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

- (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or
- (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

- (1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or
- (2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for a 'new pathway'. At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

- (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
- (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

- (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
- (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
- (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- (1) based on an allowance;
- (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
- (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

- (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or
- (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

- (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and
- (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

- (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
- (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
- (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

- (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or
- (2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and
- (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

- (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
- (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

- (1) no other payments;
- (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (4) lost earnings;
- (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
- (6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

- (1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;
- (2) to any miscarriage or termination; or
- (3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

- (1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and
- (2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and
- (2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and
- (2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

1.146 We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

- (1) when the child was born;
- (2) whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;
- (3) whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and
- (4) whether they are a:
 - (a) opposite-sex couple;
 - (b) male same-sex couple;
 - (c) female same-sex couple;
 - (d) single woman; or
 - (e) single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

1.147 We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

- (1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- (2) whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;
- (3) whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and
- (4) the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

1.148 We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 18.6

Consultation Question 112.

1.149 We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

- (1) medical screening; and
- (2) implications counselling

(where possible separating out the cost of such screening, tests or implications counselling from any other costs involved with fertility treatment).

N/A

1.150 We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

- (1) to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and

- (2) to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

1.151 We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

- (1) the current requirement of a genetic link; and
- (2) any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:
 - (a) in the new pathway;
 - (b) in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or
 - (c) in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

1.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us:

- (1) their profession; and
- (2) what they would charge to provide such a service.

N/A

Paragraph 18.13

Consultation Question 115.

1.153 We invite consultees who are intended parents to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

- (1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and

- (2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

1.154 We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

- (1) if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and
- (2) if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

1.155 We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

- (1) whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- (2) what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;
- (3) how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);
- (4) what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and
- (5) how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

N/A

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

- (1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

- (2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

(1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

(2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration.

Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

- 1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

- 1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

- (1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
- (2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
- (3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

- 1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

- (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,

- (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and
- (3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

- 1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

1.12 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;

- (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and
- (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

- (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
- (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
- (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
- (2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
- (3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

- (1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;
- (2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and
- (3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

- (1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
- (2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

- 1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

- 1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

- (1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
 - (a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
 - (b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or
- (2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

- (1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;
- (2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and
- (3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
- (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
- (2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

- (a) administrative, or
- (b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
- (2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and
- (2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

- (1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and
- (2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
- (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify a measure that contravenes recommendations of

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the ‘intended parents’ should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child’s best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women’s reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees’ views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

- (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Consultation Question 30.

- 1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

- 1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

- (1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
- (2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
- (3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
- (4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
- (5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- 1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

- 1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

- 1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

- 1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

- 1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

- 1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

- 1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;
- (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
 - (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
 - (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
- (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

- 1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

- 1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

- (1) where his or her legal parents have consented;
- (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or
- (3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

- 1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

- 1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

- (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or
- (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

- (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:
 - (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or
 - (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and
- (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

- (1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or
- (2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

- 1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

- 1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

- (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but
- (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

- 1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

- 1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Consultation Question 60.

- 1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

- 1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

- (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or
- (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

- (1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or
- (2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for a 'new pathway'. At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

- (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
- (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

- (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
- (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
- (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- (1) based on an allowance;
- (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
- (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

- (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or
- (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

1.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences:

- (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and
- (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

1.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

- (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
- (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
- (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.103 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

1.104 We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

- (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or
- (2) left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

1.105 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

1.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and
- (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

1.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

- (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
- (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

1.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

- (1) no other payments;
- (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
- (4) lost earnings;
- (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
- (6) gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

1.110 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

1.111 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

- (1) in the first trimester of pregnancy only;
- (2) to any miscarriage or termination; or
- (3) some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

1.112 We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

1.113 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

1.114 We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

1.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

- (1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and
- (2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

1.116 We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.117 We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 15.99

Consultation Question 89.

1.118 We invite overseas surrogates (or bodies representing or advocating for surrogates) to share with us their experiences of international surrogacy arrangements.

N/A

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

1.119 We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

N/A

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

1.120 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

1.121 We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

1.122 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

1.123 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling

and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

1.124 We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

1.125 We provisionally propose that:

(1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or

(2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.126 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

1.127 We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

1.128 We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

1.129 We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

1.130 We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

1.131 We provisionally propose that:

1.132 the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but

1.133 before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

1.134 We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

1.135 We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and
- (2) if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

1.136 We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

1.137 We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

1.138 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and
- (2) if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

1.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

1.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

1.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

1.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the 'intended parents' are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman's health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn't in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of 'attractiveness' for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people's thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself.

There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

1.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the 'intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

1.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

1.145 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

1.156 We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

1.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Please provide your views below:

I propose 30 years because the register will also hold this information and they should be classed as 'medical' notes by the centre treating the intended parents and the surrogate and the conditions of the HFEA Act 1990

T103 The centre must keep data necessary to ensure traceability for a minimum of thirty years (and for such longer period as may be specified in Directions) in an appropriate readable storage medium.

GDPR introduces some new rights for individuals and enhances other rights, but in general an individual's rights under GDPR are not absolute and will only apply in certain circumstances. For example, although GDPR introduces a right for individuals to have personal data erased, that right does not apply if the processing of the individual's personal data is necessary to comply with a legal obligation. In other words, centres will not need to comply with a patient's request for erasure of their IVF treatment records given that it is a legal requirement, by virtue of General Direction 0012, that the centre retains those records for at least 30 years. Matters which raise questions about the application of GDPR and the HFE Act 1990 should be considered on a case by case basis and centres should consult the Information Commissioner's website for guidance and take their own legal advice where necessary.

Consultation Question 1.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

1. all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court.

2. if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

- (1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and
- (2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

Paragraph 6.58

Consultation Question 5.

We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:

3. there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
4. it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
5. further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:

6. entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,

7. complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and
8. met eligibility requirements,
on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.
Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

We provisionally propose that:

9. the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;
10. this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and
11. the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

12. the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
13. if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
14. the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the ‘new pathway’ – particularly with the ‘intended parents’ acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child’s best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur’s recommendations.*

Consultation Question 13.

We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

15. the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
16. if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
17. if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

(1.15.1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current

- Code of Practice;
- (1.15.2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and
- (1.15.3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

- 1.1 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

18. the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
19. the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:

20. it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
 1. for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
 2. for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or
21. the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

22. the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;
23. if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and
24. if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

We invite consultees' views as to:

25. a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
26. how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

We invite consultees' views:

27. as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
28. if so, as to whether should this oversight be:
 1. administrative, or
 2. judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

29. whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
30. if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

31. as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and
32. what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

33. the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and

34. they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

35. the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
36. if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

37. whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and

38. whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We provisionally propose that:

- 47. the register should be maintained by the Authority;
- 48. the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
 - 1. identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
 - 2. non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
- 49. to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

50. where his or her legal parents have consented;

51. if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or

52. in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

53. if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or

54. if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

We provisionally propose that:

55. the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

56. the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:

1. where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or
2. following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and

57. the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

We invite consultees' views on whether:

- 58. the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or
- 59. the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

- 60. should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but
- 61. that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 12.64

Consultation Question 60.

We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

62. for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or

63. for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

- 64. those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or
- 65. if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

- 66. the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
- 67. the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

- (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
- (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
- (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- 68. based on an allowance;
- 69. based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
- 70. based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

We invite consultees' views as to:

- 71. whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- 72. the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

We invite consultees' views as to:

73. whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and

74. the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

We invite consultees' views as to:

75. whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and

76. the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

77. her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or

78. other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.38

Consultation Question 78.

We invite consultees to share their experiences:

- 79. of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and
- 80. where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.

N/A

Paragraph 15.47

Consultation Question 79.

We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

81. pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;
82. medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or
83. specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.

It is absurd to propose that one could place a monetary value on the pain of adverse pregnancy outcomes. In putting a price tag on perineal tear for example, some mothers report little pain or symptoms, others have profound ongoing fear of vaginal penetration, which can result in very significant emotional and relationship difficulties. Infection may complicate healing, and some women report long term sequelae from this, such as impaired wound healing.

Haematology conditions should also be considered. Blood loss, for example due to placental haemorrhage can be very significant, and potentially result in emergency hysterectomy and blood transfusion to save the life of the mother. It is a fact that although blood is thoroughly screened in the UK there still remains the potential for blood borne illnesses to be transmitted, and the fact that some of these may not have been identified yet by researchers is also a real risk to a mother receiving transfusion. Persons who have had a blood transfusion are currently unable to donate blood themselves in the UK, due to the risk of (vCJD) transmission. This is an indication of the gravity of receiving blood products.

No medical intervention is EVER risk free. Receiving multiple blood products in the context of Massive Transfusion Protocol (eg platelets, Fresh Frozen Plasma, cryoprecipitate) only heighten those risks.

Conditions such as HELLP (Haemolysis, Elevated Liver enzymes, Low Platelets) can be fatal, and although the maternal mortality rate is low, it can have significant sequelae, including renal failure potentially requiring dialysis, placental abruption (potentially fatal for mother and baby) permanent liver damage and retinal detachment resulting in visual impairment.

Each of these conditions have long term consequences for a woman, psychologically, physically and emotionally, and may also affect her ability to return to work or care for other children.

Also, the late complications of childbirth have been disregarded. Late consequences of childbirth can include vaginal or rectal prolapse, urinary and faecal incontinence. Women who have had a C section may experience ongoing pain around the scar. Some sources quote this as affecting between 6 and 18 percent of women. These symptoms can be profoundly distressing, and may take years to present (conversely, may present immediately).

How could we ensure that women suffering these complications are compensated? They are multifactorial, and risk increases with instrumented delivery and parity. How would it be proposed to unpick the role of a surrogate pregnancy in causing these symptoms in relation to other risk factors, for example parity, smoking history, personal medical history?

Psychiatric conditions are also absent from this list. Complications including depression and anxiety may be worsened by pregnancy. Other mental health conditions such as post natal depression and post partum psychosis can be fatal, and impact on a woman's health for many years to come. I'm quite shocked that none of these conditions have been explicitly mentioned and it does make me wonder how the list of complications was created. I'd also like to know what level of haemorrhage would be considered "excessive".

The wording of the question "should" be able to pay compensation is not the same as being mandated to do so. This potentially creates a situation where some "luckier" women would receive compensation others would not.

All of the above illustrates the risks of surrogacy and confirms my support for a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be:

84. a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or

85. left to the parties to negotiate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain.

Paragraph 15.53

Consultation Question 80.

We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question illustrates the risks of surrogacy and why I oppose it.

Paragraph 15.56

Consultation Question 81.

We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- 86. intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and
- 87. if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to give the birth mother gifts.

Paragraph 15.60

Consultation Question 82.

We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

It should not be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. (check box)

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

- 88. any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or
- 89. a fixed fee set by the regulator.

Leave both check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for her 'services'.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

- 90. no other payments;
- 91. essential costs relating to the pregnancy;
- 92. additional costs relating to the pregnancy;
- 93. lost earnings;

94. compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or
95. gifts.

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to make any type of fee or payment to the birth mother for her 'services'.

Paragraph 15.69

Consultation Question 83.

We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for any payment the law permits the intended parents to pay the surrogate for her services to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination of the pregnancy.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

This question is therefore not applicable because I oppose the payment of birth mothers for their 'services'. However, it illustrates the grave risks of surrogacy.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, if the law permits a fee payable to the surrogate to be able to be reduced in the event of a miscarriage or termination, whether such provision should apply:

96. in the first trimester of pregnancy only;

97. to any miscarriage or termination; or
98. some other period of time (please specify).

Leave all check boxes blank.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.72

Consultation Question 84.

We provisionally propose that the types of payment that are permitted to be made to surrogates should be the same, whether the surrogacy follows our new pathway to parenthood or involves a post-birth application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I am opposed to the 'new pathway' but consider that regardless of the surrogacy arrangement being used, the only payments that should ever be made are essential and basic expenses for which receipts are provided.

Paragraph 15.74

Consultation Question 85.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any categories of payment we have not discussed which they think intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.75

Consultation Question 86.

We invite consultees to express any further views they have about the payments that intended parents should be able to agree to pay to the surrogate.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 15.76

Consultation Question 87.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review:

99. for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and

100. for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

The only payments that should be made are essential and basic expenses and for which receipts are provided. The judge or other competent authority should closely monitor all financial aspects of the arrangement (in line with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations*) and refuse the parental order when payments have exceeded basic expenses. If it is not a judge overseeing the arrangements, the competent authority should be totally independent and not, for example, an agency (or 'regulated surrogacy organisation') that has been involved in the arrangements in any way.

Paragraph 15.89

Consultation Question 88.

We provisionally propose that financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway to parenthood should be enforceable by the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

We provisionally propose that if the financial terms of a surrogacy agreement entered into under the new pathway become enforceable, the ability to do so should not be dependent on the surrogate complying with any terms of the agreement relating to her lifestyle.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The idea that a 'surrogacy agreement' could place restrictions on the birth mother's lifestyle is utterly abhorrent.

Paragraph 15.99

Consultation Question 89.

We invite overseas surrogates (or bodies representing or advocating for surrogates) to share with us their experiences of international surrogacy arrangements.

Paragraph 16.10

Consultation Question 90.

We invite organisations focused on children's rights and welfare in the international context to share with us their views on our proposed reforms and consultation questions in this chapter.

N/A

Paragraph 16.12

Consultation Question 91.

We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of their experience of applying to register a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement as a British citizen and obtaining a passport for the child. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have about causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.52

Consultation Question 92.

We provisionally propose that it should be possible for a file to be opened, and the application process for obtaining registration of a child born from an international surrogacy arrangement and obtaining a passport to begin, prior to the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.53

Consultation Question 93.

We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a visa for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular, we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

N/A

Paragraph 16.68

Consultation Question 94.

We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a visa in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child, and the issue of a passport in the child's country of birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for registration of birth and a passport before the child is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

We provisionally propose that the current provision made for the grant of a visa outside of the Immigration Rules where the intended parents are not the legal parents of the child under nationality law should be brought within the Rules.

Do consultees agree?

NO

We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the grant of a visa should not be dependent on the child breaking links with the surrogate; or
- (2) that this condition should be clarified to ensure that it does not prevent the child having contact, and an on-going relationship, with the surrogate.

Do consultees agree?

YES

We invite consultees' views as to whether the current requirement for the grant of a visa outside the Rules that the intended parents must apply for a parental order within six months of the child's birth should be removed (regardless of whether the availability of the visa is brought within the Rules), if our provisional proposal to remove the time limit on applications for parental orders is accepted.

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 16.69

Consultation Question 95.

We provisionally propose that it should be possible to open a file, and begin the process for applying for a EU Uniform Format Form in respect of a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement, before the child is born. The application will need to be completed after the birth of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Allowing the 'intended parents' to start the application process for an EU Uniform Format Form for the child before she or he is born in international surrogacy arrangements appears to contradict the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations* that are designed to protect against the selling and trafficking of children and the protection of the rights of the birth mother. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

Paragraph 16.76

Consultation Question 96.

We invite consultees to provide us with evidence of the experience they have had of applying for a EU Uniform Format Form for a child born through an international surrogacy arrangement. In particular we would be interested to hear how long the application took after the birth of the child, and any information consultees have of causes of delays in the process.

Paragraph 16.77

Consultation Question 97.

We provisionally propose that the UK Government should provide a single, comprehensive guide for intended parents explaining the nationality and immigration consequences of having a child through an international surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree with such a guide, but would like to see it explaining the reasons why surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of women and children and all the other ways in which it is possible for people to enjoy children in their lives.

Paragraph 16.82

Consultation Question 98.

We provisionally propose that international surrogacy arrangements should not be eligible for the new pathway to parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 16.93

Consultation Question 99.

We provisionally propose that:

the Secretary of State should have the power to provide that the intended parents of children born through international surrogacy arrangements, who are recognised as the legal parents of the child in the country of the child's birth, should also be recognised as the child's legal parents in the UK, without it being necessary for the intended parents to apply for a parental order, but before exercising the power, the Secretary of State should be required to be satisfied that the domestic law and practice in the country in question provides protection against the exploitation of surrogates, and for the welfare of the child, that is at least equivalent to that provided in UK law.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I do not see how this proposal for such a blanket power would align with the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. The latter requires the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be given AFTER the child's birth and that the transfer of 'parenthood' should be overseen by the courts or a competent authority on an individual case by case basis, with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration. This is an important safeguard against the sale of children and for the protection of the birth mother and I believe it should apply equally to international surrogacy arrangements. I therefore strongly disagree with this proposal.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 16.94

Consultation Question 100.

We invite consultees to tell us of their experience of surrogacy arrangements in the UK involving foreign intended parents.

N/A

We invite consultees' views as to whether:

101. any restriction is necessary on the removal of a child from the UK for the purpose of the child becoming the subject of a parental order, or its equivalent, in another jurisdiction; and
102. if such a restriction is necessary, there should be a process allowing foreign intended parents to remove the child from the jurisdiction of the UK for this purpose and with the approval of the court and, if so, what form should that process take.

Restrictions and checks MUST be in place to protect the child and the birth mother from trafficking and exploitation. The process should include the same checks as would be used in an international adoption.

Paragraph 16.120

Consultation Question 101.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

I do not believe this needs changing.

Paragraph 17.18

Consultation Question 102.

We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies.

Do consultees agree?

NO

Paragraph 17.32

Consultation Question 103.

We invite consultees' views as to:

103. whether there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, ante-natal appointments or any other reason; and
104. if reform is needed, suggestions on reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.36

Consultation Question 104.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children.

Paragraph 17.40

Consultation Question 105.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.43

Consultation Question 106.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.

I am opposed to any reform in this area because it would act to normalise surrogacy, which is a human rights abuse of both women and children

Paragraph 17.56

Consultation Question 107.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area.

It is important that all health and care professionals are aware that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that 'intended parents' have no legal right to override the birth mother's wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour and childbirth. Even if she has previously agreed to them sharing decisions and being informed on these matters, she can withdraw her consent at any time for any or no reason. All professionals involved in her care are duty-bound to comply with her wishes.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

Surrogacy arrangements place additional and complicated pressures on healthcare staff and this could reduce the standard of impartial care given to birth mothers and new-borns – especially when the ‘intended parents’ are entitled, rich or of high status. This itself is a valid reason to be extremely cautious about making changes that will increase the numbers of surrogacy births.

It is generally recognised that egg donation and IVF pregnancies carry additional health risks. As most surrogacy pregnancies involve IVF, any increase in surrogacy is likely to lead to additional pressure on the NHS.

Adoption research suggests that the separation of the new-born and the birth mother has long-term negative effects on the well-being of both of them. This is likely to be the same for birth mothers and babies in surrogacy arrangements and so can be expected to place additional long-term pressures on the NHS and society as a whole. This has not been considered and there are no questions about this.

An increase in surrogacy will require an increase in egg donation, which is a risky procedure that can have a long-term negative impact on the woman’s health, including premature death. Ethical issues abound. Young women might be coerced by financial pressures to donate eggs when this isn’t in their best interests and there are worries about eugenics – where egg donors are selected on the basis of blonde hair, blue eyes and stereotypical measures of ‘attractiveness’ for example.

The law commissioners do not appear to have considered the likely impact of any of these issues. There is no question about people’s thoughts about the NHS picking up the tab for the extra costs involved in surrogacy and whether this affects their opinions on surrogacy itself. There appears to have been no evaluation of the size of the additional costs to the NHS and society.

At a time when the NHS is under severe strain, and life changing therapies (for cancer, cystic fibrosis etc) are not funded due to financial constraints it is a slap in the face to provide money for prospective parents to indulge their parenting fantasies while denying patients access to drugs which are standard of care in other counties.

We invite consultees’ views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales.

The guidance should be revised to clarify that surrogacy agreements are not legally binding and that the birth mother has the right to change her mind at any time, for any or no reason. Healthcare professionals must accept that her wishes are paramount and that the ‘intended parents' have no legal right to override her wishes or decisions in regards to her lifestyle or medical and health care, including during pregnancy, labour, childbirth and the postpartum period.

All health and care professionals should also be aware that the birth mother may be being coerced to engage in the surrogacy arrangement by one or more persons, including her spouse or partner. If paid surrogacy is legalised, this will become more prevalent, but it can still be present in so-called altruistic surrogacy arrangements.

The guidance should make it clear that healthcare professionals should be even more alert than normal to the possibility that she is being coerced and to ensure that they can speak to her alone, including during labour, and that if she changes her mind about who is present in consultations, and the labour ward/delivery suite, they must respect her wishes.

We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.

It is important that midwifery practice always prioritises the wishes of the birth mother and the wellbeing of herself and the child.

Paragraph 17.76

Consultation Question 108.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other legal issues in relation to surrogacy, not covered in this Consultation Paper, that merit examination.

It is of considerable concern that the law commissioners appear to have given no consideration to the significant risk that women will be coerced into agreeing to participate in surrogacy arrangements for someone else's benefit. This can be true in 'altruistic' surrogacy but is even more likely if substantial payments are involved.

It is well-known that women and girls are groomed and/or coerced into prostitution by partners and 'boyfriends' who act as their pimp and take all or much of their earnings. This is a major route by which many women enter prostitution and is a major factor in preventing their exit. There is no reason to expect that the same dynamics will not occur in relation to surrogacy if it is opened up and provides opportunities to make significant amounts of money.

If the law commissioners' proposals are enacted, there must therefore also be legislation that prohibits coercing a woman into a surrogacy arrangement. This should be a criminal offence and carry a hefty penalty – in recognition that it is a human rights violation and so that it acts as a deterrent. That such a law would be difficult to enforce just adds to the arguments for why paid surrogacy is a bad idea – and especially for women.

It would be far better to simply ban all surrogacy arrangements – or at the very least any payments beyond basic and essential expenses backed by receipts and overseen by a judge.

Paragraph 17.80

Consultation Question 109.

We invite consultees who are intended parents, live in the UK, and have entered into a surrogacy arrangement that led to the birth of a child to tell us:

105. when the child was born;
106. whether the arrangement was domestic or international and, if international, in which country the arrangement took place;
107. whether the arrangement led to the making of a parental order in the UK; and
108. whether they are a:
 1. opposite-sex couple;
 2. male same-sex couple;
 3. female same-sex couple;
 4. single woman; or
 5. single man.

N/A

Paragraph 18.2

Consultation Question 110.

We invite consultees who have experience of applying for a parental order in the UK to tell us:

109. whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
110. whether they had legal advice before the making of the parental order;
111. whether they were represented by a lawyer in court; and
112. the cost of any legal advice or representation.

N/A

Paragraph 18.4

Consultation Question 111.

We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

We invite consultees to tell us what they have paid for, or to provide evidence about the cost of:

113. medical screening; and
 114. implications counselling

N/A

We invite legal consultees, who advise on surrogacy and parental order proceedings, to provide evidence of what they would charge:

- 115. to provide advice sufficient to meet the proposed requirement for independent legal advice discussed in Chapter 13; and
- 116. to draft, advise on and negotiate the written surrogacy agreement required for the new pathway.

N/A

Paragraph 18.8

Consultation Question 113.

We invite consultees to tell us of the impact of:

- 117. the current requirement of a genetic link; and
- 118. any removal of this requirement in cases of medical necessity:
 - 1. in the new pathway;
 - 2. in the parental order route for domestic surrogacy arrangements; or
 - 3. in both situations.

Paragraph 18.11

Consultation Question 114.

- 122. if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

We invite consultees who are surrogates to give us their views on the impact of our proposals for reform on their ability to enter into surrogacy arrangements and, in particular:

- 123. if particular proposals will increase accessibility, and why; and
- 124. if particular proposals will restrict accessibility, and why.

N/A

Paragraph 18.15

Consultation Question 116.

We ask consultees who are intended parents to tell us:

- 125. whether the surrogacy arrangement was domestic or international;
- 126. what they spent, in total, on the surrogacy arrangement(s) that led to the birth of their child(ren), including the cost of fertility treatment, payments to the surrogate and payments to any surrogacy agency or organisation;
- 127. how they raised the funds for the surrogacy arrangement(s);
- 128. what they spent on any fertility treatment prior to entering into a surrogacy arrangement (where that treatment did not lead to the birth of a child); and
- 129. how they raised the funds for the fertility treatment.

Paragraph 18.18

Consultation Question 117.

We invite consultees' views as to the specific impact of our proposals in Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 18.20

Consultation Question 118.

We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.

It seems that before the law commissioners designed this consultation, they had already decided that surrogacy is a positive thing and so legislation should enable it. This may be explained by a limited 'pre-consultation' mainly focusing on people who already had a vested interest in surrogacy – 'intended parents,' women who claim to have had a positive experience of surrogacy, and lawyers and other organisations who stand to make money from commercial surrogacy if it is given the green light.

It seems that the law commissioners did not consider women as a group to be key stakeholders in this endeavour. This is a major error, because just as all women are affected by the institution of prostitution, so all women will be affected by any opening up of commercial surrogacy in this country.

It could even be argued that one of the key drivers of commercial surrogacy is a desire by men to break the legal and cultural recognition of the unique bond between birth mother and child – and indeed the proposals to make the 'intended parents' the legal parents from the moment of birth are a major step in this direction, and are likely to have a significant impact down the line – potentially affecting the status of all women.

Paid surrogacy opens up enormous potential for abuse and risks spouses, partners and other family members coercing a woman into engaging in commercial surrogacy for their (and not her) financial benefit. This will be a potential risk for thousands of women, which appears to have been completely overlooked by the law commissioners.

UK and Scottish Law Commissions are obliged to comply with the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) when carrying out public functions, such as this consultation. There doesn't appear to be any evidence they have done so, because they have not provided their equality considerations and impact assessments. As surrogacy has a very different impact on women and children than on adult males, we believe the law commissioners are in breach of equality legislation.

The Equality and Human Rights Commission describes the obligations under the PSED to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

There are many ways in which opening up surrogacy in the UK is likely to worsen women's position relative to men's, and the relationship between the sexes. Any loosening of the laws around surrogacy could therefore be considered discriminatory. Surrogacy is also likely to have an impact on the relations between the different generations. Imagine the rage that young people may feel when they discover that their 'parents' not only bought them but took advantage of their birth mothers.

It is of major concern that the law commissioners' ethical arguments hinge on ideas that are not based on any recognised human rights instruments – such as the idea that 'procreative liberty' confers some kind of human right to surrogacy and the idea that a woman has a human right to be a 'surrogate.' These arguments do not hold up to scrutiny and have been clearly rejected by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

It is shocking that the proposals for the 'new pathway' violate many of the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur that are designed to guard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers, including:

- The birth mother must be accorded the status of legal mother at birth, and must be under no contractual or legal obligation to participate in the legal or physical transfer of the child.
- All payments to the birth mother must be made before the legal and physical transfer of the child and must be non-reimbursable – even if she decides not to relinquish the child.
- The birth mother's choice to transfer the child "must be a gratuitous act, based on her own post-birth intentions, rather than on any legal or contractual obligation."
- Pre-conception checks, while encouraged, cannot take the place of appropriate welfare checks after the birth of the child.
- Decisions about parentage and parental responsibility must be made by a court or other competent authority on an individual basis after the birth with the best interests of the child being paramount.

The consultation is confusing and it does not conform to the government's consultation guidelines. There are too many questions, they are too detailed and do not ask the important high-level questions – such as whether you think surrogacy can ever be ethical, etc.

For all these reasons, the law commissioners should go back to the drawing board and start again from the position of women's and children's human rights. If it is found that there is no way to liberalise surrogacy law that is compliant with obligations under international treaties such as CEDAW and the UNCRC and its first optional protocol, then the law must not be liberalised.

Dear Sir/Madam,

I feel that once more my own situation has been overlooked. None of these reforms will help me as I have four donated embryos and would like to use a surrogate. The emphasis is still on the biological link. That's also discriminatory. People are allowed to adopt a child and they are allowed to be parents without a biological link. It's hypocritical. Why doesn't this issue feature on the proposed reforms? So disappointing in my case. It's allowed in the USA why not here ??? Current law violates my rights to a family life and my son to have a sibling.

Law Commission Consultation Paper 244

Building families through surrogacy: a new law

Mishcon de Reya

In response to the request of the Law Commission to comment on its provisional proposals as set out in the above report, we make the following comments within the context of our experience (which relates to international surrogacy only):

1. General

As the general aim of the proposals is to create an environment that will encourage intended parent(s) to use domestic surrogacy in preference to international surrogacy then surrogacy as a legitimate way of seeking assisted conception needs to be actively promoted and the Law must work proactively with those affected by it. Moreover, given that the current legislation regulates both domestic and international surrogacy through parentage, we welcome the shift in emphasis of parenthood from being tied to a contractual mode of legal parenthood to that of being attributed from birth.

2. Payments

While payments may be a contentious issue, (and there is a concern as to how to minimise harm and exploitation within any surrogacy - whether it be domestic or international), whatever the new national statutory framework to be adopted, it still needs to ensure that there is a degree of reality in the variety of payments to be made depending on each set of circumstances. The public also needs to be aware that surrogacy as a 'commercial' arrangement is not a 'road to riches' even in states such as California, USA where compensatory payments may be expected to be 'high' (particularly for those who believe surrogacy is mainly for celebrity parents and will attract corresponding celebrity fees). In our experience they fall between £25,000 and £45,000, although this is in addition to allowances such as for clothing and travel and compensation for specific medical procedures, and other costs such as medical costs which may be prohibitively high. Even the research by the Law Commission has identified that there is a bracket of payments ranging between £10,000 and £20,000 which may be surprising to those who either have misgivings about surrogacy and/or those who have concerns at the significant risk any woman undertakes in being a surrogate. It should provide full transparency and reassurance to those who maintain that an ethical arrangement can only be achieved if surrogates do not receive payment for themselves, when the reality is that such payments are often being disguised.

While there are valid arguments against the commodification of women and children, given that (i) there is an overall acceptance that surrogacy is an acceptable form of building a family, (through regulation rather than prohibition), and (ii) society and attitudes have evolved, then provided the appropriate safeguards as proposed by the Law Commission are implemented, this should address those concerns, albeit with the emphasis still favouring a less prescriptive approach and a degree of discretion within any payment formula. Payments can, in any event, be under the control of a third party alleviating any concerns as to inappropriate control and/or influence.

The response to some of the questions raised in Chapter 15 are at Annex A.

3. A Surrogate's right to Object

Throughout the report, there is reference for the need for certainty. We believe this can only be provided if the agreements are enforceable, particularly if the pre-birth safeguards being proposed (including pre-surrogacy assessments, psychological assessments, and counselling for both the surrogate and the intended parent(s) with enhanced background checks) are implemented.

If such agreements are not against public policy then to risk a situation whereby the surrogate should retain autonomy by having the right to object post birth for the intended parent(s) to be the legal parents (and presumably to refuse to hand over the child), this will, in our view, undermine the process. Unless the parties feel reassured about the domestic surrogacy process, then those with funds will continue to seek international jurisdictions with a largely successful programme whereas those without funds may be encouraged to venture to countries with developing and/or illegal surrogacy markets and in all likelihood, fewer safeguards.

While complaints are made that surrogacy contracts can often favour the intended parent(s), the suggestion that enforcement of the surrogacy agreement is limited to only payment seems perverse when:-

- i. this will create a surrogacy system that may hold little attraction for intended parent(s) and will not promote a system that will meet one of its objectives - to encourage domestic surrogacy in preference to international surrogacy;
- ii. various medical advances have created a predominance of gestational surrogacy, so the likelihood of any surrogate having a genetic link to the child is diminishing;
- iii. if the alleged stigma is to be removed that a surrogate can be paid for her services, then what recourse will the intended parent(s) acquire should they pay for the service and yet the surrogate retains 'their' (genetic) child; and
- iv. the creation of a process with rigorous safeguards such as professional advice, assessments, counselling pre-birth should not only remove the need to make such assessments post-birth but will help discourage those who may be more vulnerable and at risk of not complying with the agreement. Indeed, in this regard, we suggest that particular emphasis needs to be focussed in relation to the agencies and ensuring they maintain a diligent approach to the screening process whether it be by licensing, regulation etc.

If paying a surrogate to provide a service, the intended parent(s) are, we say, entitled for their child to be handed over, and for the surrogate to feel reassured that the intended parent(s) have a legal obligation for the child. It is important to reflect the true risk being undertaken by the surrogate as well as the level of trust required between the surrogate and the intended parent(s) irrespective of the agreement, and the need to ensure that the agreement does nothing to undermine this to those that can be obtained overseas.

It is understood that the attraction of many overseas jurisdictions relates to the (i) ease of enforceability of surrogacy contracts; and (ii) speed in finding a suitable surrogate. If the perceived view of domestic surrogacy is that it will remain a legal system that will not provide an enforceable agreement and not encourage women to be surrogates, creating a new regulatory system will be a pointless exercise, hence the need to ensure that any new domestic system can provide similar benefits.

4. International Arrangements

While we accept the urgent need to reform the surrogacy statutory framework, and acknowledge the divergent views on the issue, given the aims of the Law Commission, we are concerned that separate “pathways” are being proposed for international surrogacy. It would be as though such arrangements could be viewed and treated in isolation whereas amendments to national law must be viewed against the backdrop of other jurisdictions if any relevant UK agency/Court is to be satisfied as to the protection of the surrogate and the child, irrespective of the domestic laws of the overseas jurisdiction.

What is clear, however, is that where many intended parent(s) undertake a significant amount of research as to a solution to their childlessness, there is often a corresponding lack of research as to the legal implications and particularly whether the surrogacy arrangements meet the current criteria pursuant to s54 of the HFEA 2008, including the consent of the surrogate (which includes a full understanding of the legal implications by the surrogate of her consent), as well as undertaking an assessment to satisfy themselves that the surrogate was not vulnerable to exploitation by relying on agencies acting as intermediaries.

Moreover, domestic mechanisms can be put in place to ensure that any surrogacy arrangement, whether domestic or international, is reviewed prior to the surrogacy arrangement being undertaken to address issues such as consent, funding, scrutiny of the contract etc. If welfare is the paramountcy driver, then the earlier these issues can be addressed with the intended parent(s) and the surrogate would be an effective means to allay the concerns that the Law Commission raises. It would also enable the intended parent(s) to consider the risks of any international surrogacy and reflect on what steps would be required to satisfy the relevant UK agency/Court, to seek out only preferred jurisdictions with appropriate safeguards and to avoid any dispute that that would prevent the relevant UK agency/Court attributing legal parenthood.

While creating a global standard is not possible, it is arguably still within the remit of the Law Commission to create a domestic system that determines not only how domestic surrogacy operates in the U.K., but should also influence intended parent(s) to seek international jurisdictions with compatible safeguards.

Annex A – Responses to Chapter 15

Consultation Question 72.

We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- (1) based on an allowance;*
- (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts;*
- or*
- (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.*

The parties should be able to agree between themselves the basis on which any costs are to be paid, including a mixture of costs and/or an allowance.

As raised by the Law Commission, the requirement for the production of receipts could create practical or administrative challenges which some parties may consider to be burdensome. However, this should not prevent the parties from choosing this method of payment if they so choose.

Consultation Question 73.

We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and*
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".*

The surrogate should not be in a financially adverse position as a consequence of her decision to assist the intended parent(s) have a child. Intended parent(s) should therefore be able to pay the surrogate all of the costs relating to the pregnancy. As set out further below, we do not consider the distinction between 'essential' and 'additional' costs to be particularly helpful.

However, if there were to be a distinction between 'essential' and 'additional' costs, some examples of 'essential' costs would be the following: medical costs (including recommended vitamins and supplements), IVF expenses, counselling, legal fees and maternity clothes. This should not be a prescriptive list as what is 'essential' will differ on the specific circumstances of each surrogacy.

Consultation Question 74.

We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and*
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.*

As above.

Some non-exhaustive examples of 'additional' costs include the following: housekeeping expenses, lost wages, child-care expenses, mileage reimbursement and travel expenses (including for a companion if the surrogate cannot travel alone).

Yet much will depend on the nature of the pregnancy, and how invasive it is and/or the risks placed on the surrogate. Hence the additional costs could include the following: fees per embryo transfer, payment for a mock cycle (e.g. if the surrogate is required by the IVF physician to undergo hormonal therapy contemplated for the actual cycle), a dropped cycle (where the cycle is cancelled through no fault of the surrogate), fees for multiple pregnancies, compensation for the loss of fallopian tube, uterus or the requirement to undergo hysterectomy or invasive procedures (e.g. caesarean section, inserting a needle through abdominal wall to reduce number of fetuses, medically advised abortion, procedure for ectopic pregnancy etc.).

Again, such permitted costs should not be too prescriptive.

Consultation Question 75.

We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and*
- (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.*

Intended parent(s) should be permitted to pay all costs, and examples of such costs are set out above.

Consultation Question 76.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

The intended parent(s) should, if agreed, be able to pay the surrogate her actual lost earnings, although any benefits received would need to be taken into account to avoid any double counting. Such costs could also be capped.

Consultation Question 77.

We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

- (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or*
- (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above)*

We do not consider that lost potential earnings should always be paid. However, this should not prevent the parties agreeing that an element of lost potential earnings could be paid if it applies in their particular circumstances and/or it is quantifiable.

Consultation Question 79.

We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following:

- (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth;*
- (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or*
- (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an ectopic pregnancy, miscarriage, termination, caesarean birth, excessive haemorrhaging, perineal tearing, removal of fallopian tubes or ovaries or a hysterectomy.*

Intended parent(s) should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for all of the above, though we are of the view that it should be capped and/or covered by insurance.

We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any other matters in respect of which intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate compensation.

Compensation for multiple pregnancies and the requirement to pay a life assurance premium for the surrogate and the child.

We invite consultees' views as to whether the level of compensation payable should be: (1) a fixed fee set by the regulator (operating as a cap on the maximum payable), or (2) left to the parties to negotiate.

If the level of compensation were to be set by the regulator, this may need to be undertaken with a view to the fees that are charged in international surrogacies for the purposes of consistency.

Alternatively, the regulator could provide a bracket for any potential compensation payments.

Consultation Question 80.

We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate

Intended parent(s) should be able to pay for a life assurance premium for the surrogate.

Consultation Question 81.

We invite consultees' views as to whether:

- (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and*
- (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.*

We are not of the view that gifts are appropriate.

Consultation Question 82.

We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy.

Given that other professionals will be benefitting financially from the surrogacy, the cost of providing a surrogacy service should be paid to the surrogate by the intended parent(s) also.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be:

- (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or*
- (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator.*

The payment should be agreed between the parties on the basis of a bracket of payments provided by the regulator.

We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee:

- (1) no other payments;*
- (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy;*
- (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy;*
- (4) lost earnings;*
- (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or*
- (6) gifts*

As above.

This helps surrogacy arrangements to be regulated and hopefully protects all involved.

9 Consultation Question 2:

Please provide your views below:

10 Consultation Question 3: We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Please provide your views below:

I am not legal and thus do not know which process would be faster for intended parents and the surrogate, but would request that whichever route is faster be the route allocated. Intended parents have already been through a great deal by the time they reach surrogacy and having to wait to be legally named parent to their child makes the process harder. Also for the surrogate they likely would rather it be sorted faster in order to move on with their own lives and their own family.

11 Consultation Question 4:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

12 Consultation Question 5: We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the Family Procedure Rules 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

As above, if this means the intended parents are more likely to be legal parents from the birth, this would be a better scenario for all involved.

Chapter 8: Legal Parenthood: Proposals for Reform - A New Pathway

14 Consultation Question 7:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The intended parents should be the legal parents from birth.

For us, as 'intended parents' having been through a long and emotional journey before becoming parents, to finally have our long awaited child, to then have to deal with all the processes to legally be named his parents was stressful and emotional. Additionally, our friend who was a surrogate for us just wanted to get in with her life and focus on her family, rather than have to help us further with paperwork. I also objected to her husband being named the legal father of my child given he had no real link to our child.

15 Consultation Question 8:

Yes

Hopefully this would help to protect all involved.

16 Consultation Question 9: We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved. Do consultees agree?

17 Consultation Question 10: We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

18 Consultation Question 11:

No

Please provide your views below:

Again, the intended parents will have been through quite enough without the worry that the surrogate decides to keep their child. The surrogate agreed to carry the child and be given reasonable expenses. It is worrying that she may then be given the opportunity to keep the child of the 'intended parents'.

19 Consultation Question 12:

No

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate should be given no legal rights to the child that she agreed to carry and give birth to. As long as the child is in no danger and would be well looked, the intended parents should be the legal parents from the outset (whether conception or birth).

20 Consultation Question 13:

Other

Please provide your views below:

I don't fully understand this proposal but as above the surrogate has agreed to carry and deliver the baby. The intended parents should be parents legally and no parental rights should be given to the surrogate.

This is complicated as the welfare of the child is of course the most important factor. However, 'normal' pregnancies do not appear to have to go through such a process.

22 Consultation Question 15:

Yes

Please provide your views below:

The surrogate's partner has nothing to do with the child, other than being a friend of the real parents (the 'intended' parents).

No

Please share your views below:

There is no link other than a circumstantial link between the child and the surrogate's partner, so the surrogate's partner should have no legal rights to the child.

Whatever the outcome of the birth, the 'intended' parents should be regarded as the legal parents.

24 Consultation Question 17: We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth. Do consultees agree?

Please provide your views below:

Whatever the outcome of the birth, the 'intended' parents should be regarded as the legal parents.

25 Consultation Question 18: For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

Please provide your views below:

The surrogacy Agreement should cover this before conception. The 'intended' parents should be the legal parents, the surrogate agrees to become a surrogate and should be made aware of the potential dangers of pregnancy, the 'intended' parents should help to ensure the surrogate has very good medical care through the pregnancy, the birth and if needed post-birth, and should also pay any related premiums to Ensure the surrogate has adequate life insurance that does not exclude surrogacy.

26 Consultation Question 19:

38 Consultation Question 31: We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

Please provide your views below:

Our friend was a surrogate for us. The clinic we used in [REDACTED] only allowed us to do the surrogacy arrangement after our friend and her husband went to a counselling session with me and my husband; they also had their own counseling session at the clinic; and my husband and I had a counseling session. We worked with NGA to draw up a surrogacy Agreement. We paid for all medical costs and offered private medical care but our surrogate preferred to use the NHS.

Surrogacy should not be about profit making, it should be about welcoming a child into the world who will be well looked after by parents who have longed for that child, whilst ensuring all involved are treated fairly.

47 Consultation Question 39: We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood. I understand why advertising for a surrogate or to be a surrogate is banned currently. It should all be regulated so as to protect all involved.

Chapter 10: Children's Access to Information About Surrogacy Arrangements

51 Consultation Question 43: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

The birth certificate should have the 'intended' parents names on it from the birth register.

52 Consultation Question 44: We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?

Yes

Please provide your views below:

Everyone deserves to know where they came from and how they came to be. We will always be open with our son that he was born through surrogacy. I feel strongly that my husband and my name should always have been the first parental names on our child's birth certificate but I have no issue with him knowing that he was born through surrogacy.

53 Consultation Question 45: We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

Please provide your views below:

'Intended' parents should be the parents on the birth certificate from the beginning.

54 Consultation Question 46: We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings. Do consultees agree?

Commercial surrogacy becomes a tricky situation and women may only enter into surrogacy if their financial situation means this is seen as an easy way of making money. 109 Consultation Question 101: We invite consultees' views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave, and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

Please provide your views below:

The 'intended' mother should be given full maternity leave benefits, and the 'intended' father should get full paternity leave benefits. Surely these benefits exist so that parents can spend time, bond and look after their child.

110 Consultation Question 102: We provisionally propose that provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies. Do consultees agree?

No

Please provide your views below:

Both are parents, both should be given parental rights and benefits. Otherwise it is surely discrimination against people who have had to deal with infertility issues.

111 Consultation Question 103:

Please provide your views below:

Yes, rights should be given to intended parents, just as those lucky enough to carry their own child are given rights to attend clinic/hospital appointments.

Please provide your views below:

Yes. As an 'intended' mother I had to express at very regular intervals for several weeks before the birth of my son in order to be able to breastfeed him once he was born. While at work I would hide away in the toilets and throw any expressed milk away.

113 Consultation Question 105: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

Please provide your views below:

Parental leave is a must for 'intended' parents. They are after all parents and need time to bond with their new child, look after them, figure out how to become parents, wake regularly through the night for feeds and cuddles, attend appointments, and bond with other parents with new babies.

Most of the midwives we saw during appointment with my friend who was a surrogate for us were lovely. However one midwife refused to look at me and kept referring to my friend as the 'mummy'. I found that deeply upsetting. The surrogate should of course be given all medical attention as necessary, and emotional support as needed. The intended parents have already been through a great deal and are excited to become new parents and should be treated with the same respect and excitement as any expecting parents.

119 Consultation Question 111: We invite consultees' views as to the impact (social, emotional, financial or otherwise) of the current law where the intended parents are not the legal parents from birth of the child born of the surrogacy arrangement.

Please provide your views below:

Although I could not have been happier to finally become a mother to my long awaited son after a long and emotional infertility journey, and will be forever grateful to my wonderful friend who was a surrogate for us, I did find the legal process very emotional at an already emotional time. Dealing with a new born and all the paperwork and processes to be named as his legal parent was difficult for me and my husband. I have never understood why my friend was written on the initial birth certificate as my son's legal mother, and although my surrogate friend's husband is also a good friend, it felt very wrong that he was named the father of mine and my husband's child. After a lot of meetings, emails with our lawyer and the contact for the parental order, we finally got the birth certificate through with mine and my husband's names on it, along with the name of our son. I filed the original birth certificate away and I never want to have to look at it ever again. We tell our son he was born through surrogacy, he will always know the full truth, and he will know his wonderful 'auntie' who was a surrogate for us. This will help their friendship too I hope. My friend was offered further counseling but she remained adamant that she knew what she was entering into when she offered to be a surrogate for us and she only ever saw herself as a surrogate through the pregnancy and now a special auntie to my son. While I am forever grateful, I needed no reminder that I wasn't able to carry and give birth to my own son and it breaks me still that his first birth certificate does not show that I am his mother and that his actual father is his father. I am very very sure that a legal surrogacy arrangement, where all parties are fully aware of their role, and all are well looked after and protected, should result in the 'intended' parents being regarded as the parents from conception. That way any medical decisions and appointments will look after the needs and rights of child, the surrogate and the 'intended' parents, and the 'intended' parents should thus be named as the legal parents on the birth certificate.

ABOUT SurrogacyUK

SurrogacyUK is a leading, not-for-profit organisation that supports the creation of families through altruistic surrogacy in the UK. We help surrogates to meet intended parents; we educate and advise people at all stages of their surrogacy journey; and we work with stakeholders to improve the experiences and outcomes for surrogates, intended parents and families formed through surrogacy in the UK.

SurrogacyUK and UK surrogacy are thriving. We have supported the birth of almost 250 children since our foundation in 2004. In 2019 we hope to welcome another 29 surrogate children to UK families; this is four times as many as our annual average ten years ago. Today we have almost 140 active surrogate members with an average of almost one new joiner a week.

We play a very active role in supporting and advocating on behalf of the wider UK surrogacy community:

- We run the UK's largest public social media group for surrogacy (approximately 3,200 members) which provides expertly moderated advice and support to anyone at any stage of their UK surrogacy arrangement
- We run more public surrogacy events than any other organisation in Europe, with 68 planned across the country this year. As part of this we run an annual conference attracting almost 500 attendees
- We educate the public and professionals on surrogacy matters through general and professional media and at a range of fertility-related events and organisations, including the European Society of Human Reproduction and Embryology and The Fertility Show
- We support a wide range of public policy initiatives. We were a key contributor to the Department of Health's surrogacy guidance, published in February 2018, and are an active member of the Association of Fertility Patient Organisations, representing the voice of patients to the HFEA.
- We actively campaign for legal reform, through the SurrogacyUK Working Group on Legal Reform (with academic and practitioner lawyers) and the All-Party Parliamentary Group on Surrogacy, which we helped to establish.
- We undertake our own primary research with the largest number of individuals with "lived experience" of UK surrogacy (e.g. SurrogacyUK Working Group on Surrogacy Law Reform Surveys in 2015 and 2018)
- Through our members we support the research of others; our families act as case studies for the pioneering research into families created through surrogacy undertaken by the Centre for Family Research at the University of Cambridge

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This document was prepared on behalf of SurrogacyUK's Board of Trustees by its Consultation Response Team: [REDACTED]

[REDACTED]. Between us we have experience of: being a surrogate; being an intended parent; being a gamete donor; traditional surrogacy; gestational surrogacy; known gamete donation; being a parent through surrogacy; and, carrying our own children.

When preparing this response, the Consultation Response Team carefully consulted surrogates and intended parents about their views, especially where we felt their collective lived experience would be of particular importance. We would like to thank the 260 respondents to our surveys, which included 72 surrogates and 175 intended parents. Throughout our response their feedback is referred to as the SurrogacyUK 2019 Survey.

We are grateful for the ongoing support of the SurrogacyUK Working Group on Surrogacy Legal Reform. Their legal and bioethics knowledge has been invaluable, as has the information, analysis and recommendations of its 2015 and 2018 reports which we refer to in our response as the SurrogacyUK Working Group Reports.

We would also like to thank our fellow SurrogacyUK Member [REDACTED] for their individual contributions of personal and professional wisdom.

Finally, we appreciate the counsel and challenge offered by our critical friends on the SurrogacyUK Advisory Board and SurrogacyUK Ethics Committee.

FOREWORD

I am delighted to present our response to the Law Commissions' consultation on reforming surrogacy law. This is an area where SurrogacyUK has passionately campaigned for change over many years.

As Chair of SurrogacyUK, I talk to many intended parents, surrogates and children and share in their journeys. As a four-time-surrogate I have built an extensive, practical, and personal understanding of surrogacy and the emotions involved. I also collaborate and work with many surrogacy professionals, including clinics, medics, lawyers, and counsellors. Across all these stakeholders, the consensus is clear: surrogacy law is outdated and must be updated, but in a way that:

- reflects and improves the lived experience of those undertaking a surrogacy arrangement
- protects and balances the rights of all those involved, in particular children born through surrogacy
- helps improve access to surrogacy
- encourages UK surrogacy in the first instance
- and helps improve public perceptions of, and support for, this form of modern family building

This is no small task and I am impressed by the collaborative approach adopted by the Law Commissions who have carefully listened to us, our members, as well as other stakeholders and the public who hold a range of views on this topic.

Collaboration, listening and teamwork are core values for SurrogacyUK and we have worked behind the scenes to make sure that those values are mirrored in our response to this consultation. Our response has been compiled by a working group consisting of both surrogates and intended parents. We have surveyed the broader surrogacy community, and we have debated our response with our members, our Board of Trustees, the SurrogacyUK Advisory Board and our Ethics Committee, as well as the SurrogacyUK Working Group on Legal Reform. Through these groups, we are proud to have been able to draw on a broad range of experiences, skills and backgrounds, including those with personal experience of surrogacy as well as lawyers, social workers, ethicists, clinics, and more.

It should be clear from this submission that we are very positive about the proposals put forward by the Law Commissions. Many of them reflect the recommendations of the SurrogacyUK Working Group on Legal Reform and their reports in 2015 and 2018. Overall, the proposals are a huge and bold step forwards and are successful in balancing the rights and welfare of all of those involved, especially children born through surrogacy. In particular, we welcome the new pathway that will enable intended parents to become legal parents at birth to children born through surrogacy. We believe this should go even further, especially in respect to what happens if a surrogate raises an objection to the intended parents becoming legal parents. We also welcome a regulated environment that will result in safer surrogacy, as well as the inclusion of double donation. Finally, we are pleased to see that there has been no movement towards permitting commercial, profit-making surrogacy organisations in the UK. We hope that the Law Commissions will extend this protection to the kinds of payments that are permitted under new legislation, and resist any movement away from an expenses-only model. Surrogacy should be about making families, not money.

I am confident about the future of surrogacy in the UK. I am even more confident that the proposals in this submission will help secure a constructive framework for safe and fair surrogacy for families and generations to come.

1. INTRODUCTION

SurrogacyUK is delighted that the Law Commission of England and Wales, and the Law Commission of Scotland are jointly reviewing the UK's outdated surrogacy laws. Whilst the Government now recognises the important, positive role that surrogacy plays in creating families for people who can't otherwise have their own children, we share the widespread concern that the current legal framework supporting surrogacy is not fit for purpose and have long been an active voice for reform.

We appreciate the broad scope of the Law Commissions' analysis and their ambition to cover all aspects and implications of surrogacy, in both domestic and international arrangements. We support the goal of encouraging more intended parents to have children through domestic arrangements and feel that the consultation paper identifies most issues around this, and that many sensible reforms are proposed. We hope it is clear in our response where SurrogacyUK agrees with the Law Commissions and where we think there are gaps or better remedies.

Our response is focused on proposals and questions that relate to domestic (UK) surrogacy since this is the geographical scope of our activities. Occasionally we refer to specific aspects of international surrogacy where we know they have an impact on what happens here in the UK or where we think we can learn from experience and practice in other jurisdictions.

We are impressed by just how comprehensive the Law Commissions' paper is and the level of detail in both the proposals and the questions posed in the consultation. Our response is also necessarily detailed and set in the context of the current UK surrogacy landscape. However, we think it is of great importance that any proposed primary legislation establishes a legal framework that is flexible enough to handle the societal, technical and regulatory changes and challenges of future generations.

The abbreviations and definitions we use in our response are the same as those used by the Law Commissions in their consultation paper with the exception of the following:

Term	Law Commissions Definition	SurrogacyUK Definition
Surrogacy (also applies to Surrogate)	The practice of a woman agreeing to become pregnant, and deliver a baby with the intention of handing him or her over shortly after birth to the intended parents who will raise the child.	The practice of a woman agreeing to become pregnant and deliver a baby with the intention of the child being raised by intended parents. [We think the statement around what happens at birth is overly restrictive and indeed normally the intended parents care from the baby from birth]
Intended parents	The persons who have commissioned the surrogacy arrangement and who intend to become the legal parents of a child born through surrogacy.	The persons who intend to become the legal parents of a child born through surrogacy. [We do not think it is correct to describe the intended parents as commissioning the surrogacy arrangement, but instead it is initiated collectively by the surrogate and the intended parents] For simplicity, we don't refer to the gender of the intended parents, who can be either women or men, and we use the plural throughout our response to mean both solo and two intended parents.
Domestic surrogacy arrangement	A surrogacy arrangement where the surrogate and intended parents are both based in the UK and where all elements of the process, including pre-conception screening (assisted) conception, pregnancy and birth take place in the UK.	Our definition is set out in Section 3.1. [We think the Law Commissions' definition should be broadened to reflect the trans-national reality of some domestic surrogacy arrangements. We think such arrangements should also benefit from the proposals that relate to domestic surrogacy arrangements only]

2. A VISION FOR DOMESTIC SURROGACY

This section sets out SurrogacyUK's hope for how UK-based surrogacy should be in the future.

People should know - before they have a need or desire for it - that altruistic surrogacy is an established, accessible and safe way to create a family in the UK.

When deciding whether surrogacy is right for them, it should be easy for a woman thinking of becoming a surrogate, and intended parents to understand how domestic surrogacy arrangements work from start to finish.

There are many ways that surrogates and intended parents meet each other in the UK. Normally this is through social groups, with the help of organisations or from within existing friendships and families. Any approach that fosters relationships, and respects and protects the autonomy of the people involved should be encouraged.

However they meet, there should be a simple process for these parties to follow if they wish to transform their shared parenthood intentions into legal certainty. It should encourage them to build their relationship, identify any risks in their proposed arrangement before a commitment is made, and resolve issues if things don't work as planned.

Surrogates, intended parents and society should be assured that this process is managed and supervised by trusted institutions and organisations that provide support along the way and intervene if there are any welfare or legal concerns.

Surrogates and intended parents should feel secure in their roles and relationships with each other and any children they produce, throughout their surrogacy arrangement and beyond. They should feel pride in what they have achieved.

Children born through surrogacy should be content about their origins and should be able to access official information about this at an appropriate age.

Finally, we hope society recognises altruistic surrogacy as a benefit and provides a supportive environment for surrogates, intended parents and the families they create.

SurrogacyUK believes that altruistic surrogacy will flourish as a positive way to create a family in this country if this vision is delivered by a reformed legal framework.

3. A PRACTICAL PROPOSAL FOR DOMESTIC SURROGACY

This section sets out a reformed framework that delivers SurrogacyUK's vision, taking an holistic view of those Law Commissions' proposals that we support .

3.1 Definition of Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements

The definition of what constitutes a domestic surrogacy arrangement should include:

- the surrogate child is normally born in the UK
- the surrogate is normally domiciled in the UK
- at least one of the intended parents is domiciled or habitually resident in the UK
- the surrogacy organisation - if one is involved in the arrangement - is a regulated, UK-based entity
- the fertility treatment - if required - takes place at a clinic in the UK or another country which is recognised as having equivalent regulatory standards and laws as the UK

3.2 Legal Parenthood in Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements

Recognising the special circumstances of surrogacy, a surrogate should have the right not to be the mother of a child she carries for intended parents. This means she should be neither a legal parent nor have any parental responsibility for the child when it is born.

Acknowledging the importance of shared intent between the surrogate and intended parents in surrogacy, the law should recognise that the intended parents will be the legal parents of the child the surrogate is carrying for them when it is born.

The surrogate should have the right to object to the intended parents becoming the legal parents of the child she carries, and, if she does so within a defined period of time, the legal consequences of this objection should be determined by a court.

A surrogate should have full bodily autonomy during pregnancy, though it should be usual practice - with her consent - for the intended parents to be recognised during this time as the future parents and to be involved in decision-making that affects the unborn child.

A child's genetic and gestational origins and legal parents should be recorded in a National Register of Surrogacy Arrangements, access to which should be governed by similar principles to donor conception data.

3.3 A New Pathway for Domestic Surrogacy

A New Pathway should exist to enable surrogates and intended parents to give their parenthood intentions legal standing and certainty in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

Eligibility

The following types of domestic surrogacy arrangements should be eligible for the New Pathway, irrespective of how the surrogate and intended parents meet:

- Traditional surrogacy
- Gestational surrogacy
- Surrogacy using gametes or embryos from known donors

Mandatory Counselling and Screening

Mandatory counselling and screening requirements should be met before legal parenthood consents can be given. These requirements should be supervised by a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation.

Mandatory screening should include:

- eligibility checks on all parties
- suitability-for-surrogacy assessments of all parties
- welfare-of-child assessment of the intended parents

Statutory Legal Parenthood Consent

At least four weeks before conception, informed consent should be given freely by all parties to the legal parenthood intentions of the surrogacy arrangement. This should be recorded in official forms witnessed by a representative of a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation.

Before conception it should be possible for any party to withdraw their consent to the legal parenthood intentions.

From conception to a point to be determined in law, a surrogate should be able to seek a change to the legal parenthood intentions of the surrogacy arrangement, which should be determined by a court. In such situations, the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child once it is born until a decision is reached by the court, though the surrogate should be able to apply for parental responsibility during this period.

The intended parents should not be able to seek a change to the legal parenthood intentions of the surrogacy arrangement from conception onwards.

Statutory Payment Consent

All parties should freely give their informed consent to cost reimbursements the intended parents intend to make to the surrogate. Consents to these payment requirements should be recorded at the same time as the legal parenthood consents in official forms witnessed by a representative of a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation.

It should be possible to amend the payment requirements at any time with the consent of all parties.

Surrogacy Plan (Surrogacy Agreement)

The creation of a Surrogacy Plan that sets out the further intentions of the surrogacy arrangement should be prepared, but the provisions within it should not be enforceable. This should be a written document that is witnessed by a representative of a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation.

Independent Legal Advice

Independent legal advice should only be required where a legal risk has been identified or there is a concern regarding the ability to provide freely informed consent to the statutory requirements.

Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements outside the New Pathway

If a domestic surrogacy arrangement has not followed the New Pathway, then the parenthood intentions should not have legal standing prior to the birth of the child. In such cases, a surrogate should be the sole legal parent of a child until a Parental Order is obtained to transfer legal parenthood to the intended parents. If the intended parents are caring for their child when the application is made, then it should be usual practice for the court to give them parental responsibility until such time as the application is determined.

3.4 Payments in Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements

Intended parents should reimburse all actual costs incurred by a surrogate, who should make neither a loss nor a profit from a surrogacy arrangement. There should be clear rules around the types of costs which can and cannot be reimbursed. All parties should be accountable for their compliance with these rules and for accurately recording associated payments in official forms.

Regulated Surrogacy Organisations should be responsible for monitoring such compliance and associated statutory record keeping in the New Pathway.

Payments recorded in official forms in the New Pathway should be enforceable by both parties and should not be counted as income for the purposes of tax, national insurance or benefits calculations.

Payments made beyond statutory declarations or in arrangements outside the New Pathway should not be enforceable by either party, nor should they be exempt from tax, national insurance or benefit calculations. Courts should have the power to recover any payments that do not abide by the rules, but this should not impact on the determination of legal parenthood.

The payment rules should support the development of surrogacy-specific funding, insurance and financial protection products.

3.5 Regulation of Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements

Regulated Activities

The following activities in a domestic surrogacy arrangement should be provided on a not-for-profit basis only by a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation that is supervised by a surrogacy regulator:

- Screening of parties and/or compiling data for the purposes of a surrogacy arrangement
- Facilitating the formation of a surrogacy arrangement and any associated agreements between parties
- Witnessing that informed consent is freely given by all parties to statutory legal parenthood and payment requirements (New Pathway only)
- Supporting or managing any surrogacy-related activities on behalf of one or more parties to a surrogacy arrangement
- Statutory record keeping and registrations (New Pathway only)

Regulated Surrogacy Organisations

Regulated Surrogacy Organisations should be UK-based not-for-profit entities. Such entities should not be controlled or influenced by other entities or individuals that could profit from the activities they perform.

Regulated Surrogacy Organisations should have policies, practices and contractual arrangements that respect the autonomy of any party to a surrogacy arrangement.

Regulator

Regulated Surrogacy Organisations should be licenced and supervised by a surrogacy regulator which sets duties and standards, and monitors compliance. Organisations that are not compliant with their licence-to-operate should face regulatory penalties, including withdrawal of their licence.

Unlawful surrogacy-related activities by individuals and organisations should be a criminal offence. This should include false representation as a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation.

3.6 Other Considerations in Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements

Employment law should offer similar rights to those involved in a surrogacy pregnancy as any other pregnancy, with adjustments made to recognise the specific needs of a surrogacy pregnancy.

Education and training should raise awareness of how the public can access surrogacy and how professionals should support it.

4. OUR POSITION ON KEY ISSUES RAISED IN THE CONSULTATION

This section sets out SurrogacyUK's position regarding the Law Commissions' proposals that, in our view, have the most significant consequences for domestic surrogacy arrangements.

As well as evaluating whether the Law Commissions' proposals support our vision for domestic surrogacy arrangements, we applied the principles that a future legal framework should:

- Take as its starting point the real-life experiences of surrogates, intended parents and their families; we think their experience, wisdom and the associated empirical evidence on what works is more powerful than mere opinion and belief
- Respect and protect the interests of children born through surrogacy, and respect and protect the autonomy of surrogates and intended parents.
- Encourage relationship-based surrogacy, not transactional surrogacy or the commodification of surrogates or intended parents
- Endeavour to treat those parties involved in surrogacy in the same way as it treats families created by other means, including 'naturally'
- Work in the best interests of all surrogacy arrangements
- Ensure consistency with other public policy positions around donation, assisted reproduction and the legal relationships between individuals
- Notwithstanding this, recognise what is unique to surrogacy and requires its own approach
- Improve how surrogacy is perceived by the general public and help dispel any misunderstandings surrounding surrogacy arrangements
- Increase the attractiveness and accessibility of domestic surrogacy relative to international destinations

We have grouped our positions in the following sections:

- 4.1 Eligibility Requirements for Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements
- 4.2 Legal Parenthood in Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements
- 4.3 Payments in Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements
- 4.4 Regulation of Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements
- 4.5 Other Thoughts on The New Pathway

4.1 Eligibility Requirements for Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements

This section sets out our position on key eligibility requirements for domestic surrogacy arrangements, which we think should be the same in both the New Pathway and the Parental Order route, except where we state otherwise. In forming our position on eligibility, we have been very much guided by the principles that apply to other forms of assisted reproduction.

SurrogacyUK's Position:

- Double donation should be allowed (Section 4.11).
- There should not be a statutory requirement of medical necessity for surrogacy or double donation, but we do think that surrogacy organisations should be allowed to apply this test if they want to (Sections 5.56 and 5.59).
- Surrogates and intended parents should be over 18 years old when they consent to the surrogacy arrangement (Sections 5.61 and 5.62).
- Restrictions should be applied to stop the UK becoming a location for international surrogacy (Section 4.12), whilst recognising that some domestic surrogacy arrangement might have an international dimension (Section 4.13)

4.11 SurrogacyUK supports 'double donation' in surrogacy arrangements.

SurrogacyUK supports 'double donation' in surrogacy arrangements

We support a change in the law to recognise surrogacy arrangements where fully donated gametes/embryos from known donors are used, i.e. the intended parents are not genetically related to the child. We think that the current law unreasonably discriminates against people who are unable to carry their own child since double donation is lawful in other forms of assisted reproduction.

Some commentators argue that double donation should be treated as adoption because the child has no genetic link to the intended parents. We disagree because the pre-conception intent of the surrogate to carry the child for the intended parents, and of the identity of that child, differentiates surrogacy from adoption.

In the case of traditional surrogacy arrangements using donated sperm (and the surrogate's egg), the sperm donor should be screened in accordance with HFEA requirements and conception should occur under the supervision of a clinic (the latter is to maximise the certainty at the point of conception that the donor is the genetic father of any child born of the arrangement).

As in other forms of assisted reproduction, we should strongly discourage the use of anonymously donated sperm but this cannot be controlled outside the New Pathway. In such cases, before making a Parental Order, we think the court should be satisfied that the parties to the surrogacy arrangement had agreed their surrogacy intent prior to conception. The law should avoid the possibility of women with unwanted pregnancies seeking intended parents for surrogacy arrangements and vice versa, which is something we have, very occasionally, experienced requests to facilitate.

4.12 SurrogacyUK supports eligibility restrictions to stop the UK becoming a location for international surrogacy arrangements.

SurrogacyUK supports eligibility restrictions to stop the UK becoming a location for international surrogacy arrangements

We think that it is reasonable to expect that it is in the best interests of all parties and wider society if a surrogacy arrangement normally occurs in the country where the surrogate and intended parents both live, because they may have a better chance of establishing a relationship, they may have a shared understanding of culture and practices, and the child would be born in the country where it will reside. This is why we support the goal of encouraging more intended parents to have children through domestic arrangements. We think, however, that steps to make the UK more attractive to our own residents will also appeal to people from outside the UK, something we should avoid. We think that the following measures should be taken to stop the UK becoming a location for international surrogacy arrangements:

- Surrogates should normally be domiciled in the UK to reduce the risk of overseas women seeking domestic surrogacy arrangements, either as a way to live in the UK or for financial gain, on a voluntary or forced basis. We think there is a reasonable risk of this occurring because we already have regular enquires from women in low income countries wishing to become UK-based surrogates. We suggest this should normally - but not always - be a requirement in order to allow reasonable exceptions, for example, a close friend or family member who lives overseas offering to act as a surrogate
- Intended parents should be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK to reduce the risk of overseas intended parents arriving with the intention of leaving again when the child is born; consideration should be given to how an habitual residence test should be applied to meet this requirement
- Surrogate children should normally - but not always - be born in the UK to allow for reasonable exceptions; for example: a surrogate is UK domiciled, but lives overseas (see above); a surrogate wishes to give birth overseas for personal/medical reasons (e.g. she works abroad); or, a surrogate unexpectedly gives birth overseas.

4.13 SurrogacyUK supports some aspects of domestic surrogacy arrangements taking place overseas.

SurrogacyUK supports some aspects of domestic surrogacy arrangements taking place overseas

It is not uncommon in pregnancies achieved through artificial conception for some or all of the clinical treatment to take place abroad. Indeed, intended parents may have had such treatments to create and store embryos when they were trying themselves to conceive through IVF, before turning to surrogacy. We think that as long as the treatment takes place in an overseas clinic that meets HFEA requirements, in a country that has equivalent laws and regulations for surrogacy, then the arrangement should be able to qualify as a domestic surrogacy arrangement.

4.2 Legal Parenthood in Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements

This section sets out our position on legal parenthood in domestic surrogacy arrangements. In forming our position, we have considered with great care the special circumstances of identity and intent in surrogacy and we have given significant weight to what people with real life experience say this should mean.

SurrogacyUK's Position:

- A woman should have the right not to be recognised as the legal mother of a child she carries for intended parents (section 4.21), nor to have parental responsibility at birth (Section 4.22)
- Intended parents should be recognised as the legal parents at birth (Section 4.23)
- A surrogate should have the right to object to the intended parents being the legal parents, but the intended parent should remain the legal parents unless a court determines otherwise (Section 4.24)
- The duration of the right to object requires further consultation and evaluation (Section 4.24)

4.21 SurrogacyUK supports a surrogate's right not to be recognised as the mother of the child she is carrying.

SurrogacyUK supports a surrogate's right not to be recognised as the mother of the child she is carrying

In our experience, surrogates do not see themselves as the mother of the child they carry for intended parents. They overwhelmingly support a change in the law so that surrogates are not recognised as the mother of the child at birth. This is consistently demonstrated by surrogates, most recently in the SurrogacyUK 2019 Report in which 95% of surrogates reported they want the intended parents to be the legal parents from birth¹.

We therefore support the Law Commissions' proposals for a surrogate not to be recognised as the legal mother at birth if the surrogacy arrangement follows the New Pathway.

4.22 SurrogacyUK does not support a surrogate having parental responsibility for the child for a period of time after birth.

SurrogacyUK does not support a surrogate having parental responsibility for the child for a period of time after birth

In our view the proposal for a surrogate to have parental responsibility for a period of time after the birth is not consistent with the wish of surrogates not to have a parental role. This view is supported by most surrogates who responded to the SurrogacyUK 2019 Survey in which 72% said they did not want to have any parental responsibility after birth.²

The consultation paper proposes that it would be helpful for a surrogate to have parental responsibility for the period from the birth of the child she carries until her right to object expires. One of the reasons given is that the surrogate will always be present at the birth and the intended parents might not. For example, decisions might need to be made regarding the child's neonatal care in the absence of the intended parents. We do not agree; surrogates do not see themselves as a parent of the child and it would not be fair or appropriate for them to make such decisions. Instead the hospital should first attempt to contact the intended parents and then do as they would do in other situations when no one with parental responsibility is available.

4.23 SurrogacyUK supports the recognition of intended parents as the legal parents of their child at birth.

SurrogacyUK supports the recognition of intended parents as the legal parents of their child at birth

The consultation paper proposes that, in the new pathway, intended parents can be recognised as legal parents from birth. This proposal has received consistent and overwhelming support³, most recently in our SurrogacyUK 2019 Survey, in which 97% of responders agreed⁴. We therefore support this proposal.

4.24 SurrogacyUK supports a surrogate's right to object to the intended parents being the legal parents of the child she carries, but the intended parents should remain the legal parents unless a court determines otherwise.

SurrogacyUK supports a surrogate's right to object to the intended parents being the legal parents of the child she carries, but the intended parents should remain the legal parents unless a court determines otherwise

The Law Commissions' proposal that a surrogate should have a right to object to the intended parents becoming the legal parents at birth has stimulated much debate within our organisation, across our membership and the wider surrogacy community.

³ SurrogacyUK Working Group on Surrogacy Law Reform, Further evidence for reform (2018) ,p78

We asked our SurrogacyUK 2019 Survey respondents if they thought surrogates should have the right to object⁵. 58% of surrogate and 60% of intended parent disagreed that a surrogate should have a right to object. There was a significant minority of respondents, however, who agreed with the Law Commissions' proposal that the surrogate should have a right to object (30% of surrogates and 31% of intended parents).

Whilst we note that most surrogates who responded do not want a right to object, we think that surrogates should not have their autonomy to exercise this right removed from them. If a surrogate exercises her right to object, however, we do not think she should automatically become the mother of the child, but instead the intended parents should remain the legal parents of the child from birth unless a court determines otherwise. We note that, even in the rare circumstance that a surrogate objects to the intended parents becoming legal parents, it is not always the case that a surrogate wants to become a legal parent herself. We feel strongly that assumptions about a surrogate's intentions should not be embedded in legislation. Furthermore, we believe the Law Commissions' proposal automatically to grant legal parenthood to the surrogate where she objects to the intended parents' legal parenthood may discourage a surrogate from using her right to object for reasons other than wanting to become the mother. We think that having judicial oversight would be the most appropriate way to consider the welfare of the parties involved and allow the court to decide what is in the best interests of the child.

We asked our SurrogacyUK 2019 Survey responders when the right to object should expire⁶: 44% respondents thought at or before birth and 34% thought a fixed period after birth. A number of people are concerned that if the time period ends just a week before the deadline for intended parents to register the birth (i.e the current proposal) then this wouldn't leave the intended parents enough time to complete the registration process. We assume that the timing of the birth registration will be decoupled from the right to object period if our proposal is accepted for intended parents to retain legal parenthood unless a court decides otherwise. As an organisation we couldn't reach a firm conclusion on the time period and feel this requires further consultation and analysis once the Law Commission confirms its proposal on which party should have legal parenthood during this time.

Finally, we think it's important to highlight that the Law Commissions' current proposal to allow the surrogate automatically to become the mother of the child if she exercises her right to object fails to remove the very uncertainty around legal parenthood that they have acknowledged is a problem with the current law. This lack of legal certainty has been cited as one of the main reasons intended parents state that they seek international surrogacy arrangements⁷. Similarly, we believe this is likely to be a significant deterrent to women becoming surrogates in the UK.

4.3 Payments in Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements

This section sets out our position on payments for domestic surrogacy arrangements, which we think should only be to reimburse a surrogate's actual costs. We feel surrogacy should be seen as a benefit to society provided by private individuals and so reimbursed costs should be exempt from tax, national insurance or means-tested benefits. Our position on payments represents what most surrogates and intended parents in the UK consistently tell us they want: profit-free altruistic surrogacy.

SurrogacyUK's Position:

- The legal framework should continue to support the UK's flourishing altruistic surrogacy model (Section 4.31)
- Surrogates should not profit from surrogacy and this should be prohibited in law (Section 4.31)
- Surrogates should be able to recover their actual costs associated with a surrogacy arrangement (Section 4.32)
- There should be simple rules and guidance for surrogates, intended parents and surrogacy organisations to use (Section 4.32), and associated compliance checks, (Section 4.33) to ensure that the reimbursement model operates as intended
- Surrogacy should be seen as a benefit to society provided by private individuals and reimbursed costs should be exempt from tax, national insurance or means-tested benefits (Section 4.34).

4.31 SurrogacyUK does not support for-profit payments to surrogates.

SurrogacyUK does not support for-profit payments to surrogates

SurrogacyUK thinks that the current law, regardless of the deficiencies we discuss elsewhere, has played an important, positive role in establishing a flourishing altruistic surrogacy model in the UK. In this country we have a respectful, reciprocal and relationship-based culture and practice founded on the altruistic principles of the existing law. We also have a model that is relatively financially accessible compared with other countries.

We agree with the Law Commissions' view that there are many contributing factors to an altruistic model and we share the Law Commissions' observation that the main features are: the presence of not-for-profit surrogacy organisations; the absence of enforceable private contracts in surrogacy arrangements; and that surrogates should not profit from surrogacy.

As we state elsewhere, we are delighted that the Law Commissions propose to retain the first two features of an altruistic model and we think it is also of utmost importance that the principle that a surrogate should not profit from surrogacy should also remain in law.

How we define not-for-profit reimbursements and for-profit payments

We welcome the Law Commissions' initiative to ensure we all have a common understanding of what different types of payments mean and we respond to the specific questions asked about this in Sections 5.70-80. We also queried surrogates and intended parents what they thought of the payment types and their responses can be found later in this section when we review their attitudes towards payments. We took their views into account in developing the SurrogacyUK position on what constitutes not-for-profit reimbursements and for-profit payments, set out below:

- We consider any payment made by intended parents to reimburse a surrogate for actual costs related to a surrogacy arrangement to be a not-for-profit reimbursement.
- We think any payment made by intended parents to a surrogate to pay her for the service of being a surrogate, which leaves her with a sum of money after her actual costs have been reimbursed, to be a for-profit payment.
- We consider that compensation payments, either triggered by a medical treatment, a medical complication or the general pain and inconvenience of the surrogacy arrangement, that are paid in addition to the reimbursement of actual costs, are a for-profit payment.
- We think, however, that the fixed "lump sum" "compensation" payments that are encouraged by some individuals and other organisations are not actually intended to compensate for an apparent harm, but instead reimburse costs, with a small profit on top. We note from the Law Commission's own analysis⁸ that fixed payments often fall within a similar range to those calculated on a strict reimbursement basis by individuals and organisations like ourselves. It would seem to us, therefore, that the current law and practice has been effective in setting a cap on for-profit payments under the current system. We explain in Section 4.32, though, why we think fixed and capped payments like this are an unsatisfactory way of reimbursing costs.

Why we think for-profit payment is a bad idea and shouldn't be allowed in law

SurrogacyUK knows, from supporting almost 250 births through surrogacy, that there are significant ethical, emotional and physical health issues and risks to consider when a woman carries a child for someone else and that it is important that people make sensible decisions around this.

All of us know that money can have a significant influence on a person's behaviour. As a result, we don't think that financial reward should be a material factor in a woman's decision to become a surrogate, to carry a pregnancy, to accept or refuse medical treatment, and to decide whether or not to be the mother of a child she carries. The decisions a surrogate makes around surrogacy have an impact not just on her, they also affect any child she might carry, its intended parents, and her own family and dependents. The converse is also true, intended parents who make a payment to someone to become their surrogate may have an impact on their behaviour towards and expectations of her. A financial transaction diminishes the relational aspect of surrogacy.

We do not think for-profit surrogacy should be a matter of individual choice since a profit motive could induce someone into being a surrogate who might not otherwise choose to be or might trap someone in a surrogate pregnancy who becomes dependent upon it for income. This could have unwelcome outcomes for all the individuals involved. We are aware of anecdotal evidence that surrogates might already profit from surrogacy in the UK. If this is the case then we think the amounts being paid are very modest, otherwise they would be noticeable in data (perhaps they are informally ‘capped’ by the altruistic intent of the current law and common practice). These small amounts of money made today by a minority should not be used to justify the removal of restrictions on profit-making.

If surrogacy took on the characteristics of a paid occupation then we believe this would introduce a more transactional, commodified and objectified culture and practice in the UK, which we do not think is in the interests of the individuals involved or the families they create. It would raise many questions about the relationship between the surrogate (the ‘service provider’), the intended parents (the ‘clients’), and the child (the ‘output’ of this commercial relationship). How would such a relationship be governed? We cannot see how a for-profit model could operate if the law doesn’t allow enforceable contracts for the service the surrogate is delivering. We think such contracts would be an unacceptable intrusion into a woman’s autonomy. Such a model would have issues and risks quite different to altruistic surrogacy and which would most likely require a different form of regulatory oversight that isn’t covered in this paper.

Why we don’t think for-profit payment would increase the number of UK surrogates

We are sceptical of the argument that allowing surrogates to be paid would lead to a significant increase in the number of surrogates in the UK, since surrogates tell us they don’t want to be paid. Some women also tell us that they would stop being surrogates if a for-profit model were introduced because they would not want people to assume that they were doing it for reward.

Most recently, in our SurrogacyUK 2019 Survey, we asked surrogates to indicate whether or not they were in favour of each payment type listed in the Law Commissions’ consultation document⁹. The table below indicates very strong support for reimbursement of costs (green) and low support for explicit payments (red); just 6.7% of surrogates said they think it’s acceptable to pay a surrogate for her services.

⁹ Appendix 1, Charts 10.1-13

Payment Type	Surrogate
	Yes	No

A payment for the pain and inconvenience of being a surrogate	26.7%	68.9%
Payment (on top of expenses) for her service of being a surrogate	6.7%	57.8%

SurrogacyUK's altruistic ethos and expenses-only approach is very popular with new surrogates. We have over 140 active surrogates with an average of almost one new joiner each week. We think we have attracted far more surrogates in recent years than other UK organisations that are supportive of for-profit payments, but we cannot verify this since we don't think they publish statistics.

We also think it is not a compelling argument to point to the commercial models in other high-income countries as an indication of what would happen here. As the Law Commissions note, some commentators suggest that the relatively high number of surrogacy arrangements in US states where commercial surrogacy is allowed is indicative of what could be achieved here. However we observe the relatively high number of surrogacy arrangements in Canada compared to the UK and that surrogacy operates on an altruistic basis in both countries. We suggest that other factors that are common across North America, such as the certainty around legal parenthood, the simplicity of process, the quality of regulation/institutions, and social attitudes, play a more important role in encouraging surrogacy. As we write elsewhere, we are delighted that the Law Commissions are also considering these other factors in this consultation.

Why we don't think for-profit payment would change the number of UK intended parents seeking domestic rather than international surrogacy arrangements

Most UK intended parents tell us that they don't want to pay a surrogate to carry their child. Most recently, in our SurrogacyUK 2019 Survey, we asked intended parents to indicate whether or not they were in favour of each payment type listed in the Law Commissions' consultation document¹⁰. The results were similar to the surrogate responses and the table below indicates very strong support for reimbursement of costs (green) and very low support for explicit payments (red).

¹⁰ Appendix 1, Charts 10.1-13

	Yes	No

A payment for the pain and inconvenience of being a surrogate	41.5%	40.8%
Payment (on top of expenses) for her service of being a surrogate	17.7%	56.9%

We note stronger support for compensating payments from intended parents than we do surrogates, but we do wonder if this is because the Law Commissions gives insurance as an example payment in this category. Many intended parents cover the cost of insurance, which we believe to be a reimbursement, not compensation, since it covers the actual cost of insurance premiums for policies to replace lost income if a surrogate cannot work or dies as a result of the pregnancy.

We support the view that UK intended parents who have overseas surrogacy arrangements do so primarily to increase their chances of meeting a surrogate or where there is certainty around having a baby and (so they think) becoming its legal parents, rather than a desire to pay their surrogate¹¹.

Why we think for-profit payment would reduce access to domestic surrogacy arrangement for many UK intended parents

Whilst we observe that intended parents don't want to pay for surrogacy, we do recognise that many will participate in a commercial model and pay a surrogate (and agency) if it helps them fulfil their desire to have a child. This is evidenced by the number of UK intended parents having children through commercial surrogacy destinations, in particular the United States and Ukraine, and India when this was an option. We note various studies over time consistently showing that the cost of surrogacy in such destinations is high compared to the UK when all costs are included¹². This limits access to those intended parents with the highest incomes, particularly when the surrogacy location is a high-income country like the US where the Law Commissions note that the total cost can be up to £200,000 for twins¹³. Given the high demand for surrogacy, we would be concerned if allowing surrogates to make a profit in the UK led to the surrogacy only being an option for the rich.

4.32 SurrogacyUK supports the reimbursement of a surrogate's actual costs.

SurrogacyUK supports the reimbursement of a surrogate's actual costs

SurrogacyUK supports a reimbursement model that enables a surrogate to recover her actual costs directly related to a domestic surrogacy arrangement. At the end of an arrangement she should not be out of pocket, nor should she be left with unspent funds.

We think the key principle should be that each cost should be as much as is appropriate to satisfy a reasonable need that arises from the surrogacy arrangement. We think that it would be helpful if clear guidance is provided on how this principle should be interpreted, and in particular what constitutes a reasonable (or conversely, unreasonable) need. We recognise that most needs across most pregnancies will be similar - which may explain the prevalence of payments in the range of £10,000 to £15,000 observed by the Law Commissions in available data¹⁴, but some will be particular to an individual. In one example we are aware of, a surrogate who is a keen horsewoman stated in an online discussion on expenses that she had to pay someone to feed and muck out her horses on days when surrogacy commitments or pregnancy-related events meant she was unable to do this herself. We see this as a reasonable need, but it is unlikely to form a core feature of surrogate's expenses.

Furthermore, as our lifestyles and society changes over time, so do our expectations around needs: some will disappear and new ones will arise. Our growing appreciation of the importance of mental wellbeing, for instance, has led to an increasing acceptance of mindfulness-related needs that weren't common a decade ago.

Whilst we feel that setting the types of costs that can be reclaimed would be unreasonable interference, we do think it would be important for the regulator to help set expectations for surrogates and intended parents, perhaps by stating what needs are normally acceptable, normally not acceptable, or never acceptable, and what time period is eligible. These are judgments we make at SurrogacyUK today when asked to give our opinion on a new type of cost, either by a surrogate or intended parents. For example, we would expect guidance to state that costs associated with core, day-to-day living needs during the surrogacy arrangement that also exist before and afterwards - such as housing - are never acceptable for reimbursement.

¹³ The Law Commissions, Building families through surrogacy: a new law (2019), p64

¹⁴ The Law Commissions, Building families through surrogacy: a new law (2019), p327

We don't think it would be appropriate to fix or cap the amounts that can be reimbursed for costs, either for a specific need or for the surrogacy arrangement overall, since this could lead to surrogates suffering a financial loss as a result, or dissuade women with costs greater than the fix or cap from becoming surrogates. Again, this is because each surrogate's needs and the associated costs are unique.

- To illustrate a divergence of costs associated with one specific need - unpaid leave - Appendix 2 lists the types of jobs SurrogacyUK surrogates told us they do for a living when we polled them. Unsurprisingly, there are a big variety of roles and hours worked, which in turn means there would be a wide cost range associated with replacing incomes when the surrogates need to take unpaid leave. We would expect some clustering that reflects the distribution of income in society.
- To illustrate the divergence of overall costs for surrogacy arrangements, Appendix 3 lists the estimated costs (a proxy for actual cost) for all SurrogacyUK surrogates since we started recording this data in 2016; the amounts range from £6,000 to £23,000 with the median at £12,000 (note: the figures are rounded due to the nature of estimating).

In these examples of costs, both for a specific need and cost for a surrogacy arrangement overall, we cannot see how a fix or cap can be set without disadvantaging some or many surrogates.

Additionally, setting a fixed amount for cost reimbursement (or a cap that operates in practice as a fixed amount) means that some surrogates would make a profit from a surrogacy arrangement and some would be out of pocket. We find this most unsatisfactory and is effectively what happens when a surrogate - either independently or following an organisation's guidance - fixes the amount of payment she receives based on what is perceived to be a 'going rate for expenses' rather than on her own needs.

4.33 SurrogacyUK proposes a new compliance framework for payments to surrogates.

SurrogacyUK proposes a new compliance framework for payments to surrogates

We recognise that if a cost-recovery model is introduced without set cost types or fixed/capped amounts then there is a risk that profit disguised as payments could occur. To mitigate this risk, SurrogacyUK suggests that the costs associated with a surrogacy arrangement should be recorded in an official form that is signed by all parties to the arrangement and countersigned by a representative of a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation. The parties should attest that all payments associated with the surrogacy arrangement are recorded on the form and relate to actual cost-recovery, and the Regulated Surrogacy Organisation should be satisfied that the costs are accurate, appropriate and reasonable.

We think that there should be a requirement for surrogates to record costs they have incurred and intended parents to record payments they have made. Some people who advocate for a fixed payment or for-profit payments say that is complicated and burdensome, but this is what SurrogacyUK asks our surrogates and intended parents to do today without complaint.

The Law Commissions ask whether payments should be made on production of valid receipts or based on an allowance. We think that whilst there should be a duty on surrogates and intended parents to keep accurate records of costs incurred and intended parents of reimbursements made, there should not be a requirement for payments to be made on reimbursement of receipts. SurrogacyUK doesn't operate such a system today because the administrative burden and associated costs would not be popular with our members. If such a system were to be required, then we think it should apply to all domestic surrogacy arrangements, to stop this being a deterrent to people using the New Pathway.

We think compliance would be encouraged if only the amounts recorded on the official form could benefit from tax/benefit privileges and can be enforced by all parties (see sections below for more details).

Finally, we think the courts should have the power in all domestic surrogacy arrangements to direct the parties to remedy any discrepancies between actual payments made and the payment rules, though this should be considered as a separate matter to legal parenthood.

4.34 SurrogacyUK proposes the exclusion of reimbursed costs from tax, national insurance and benefits calculations.

SurrogacyUK proposes the exclusion of reimbursed costs from tax, national insurance and benefits calculations

We believe that not-for-profit surrogacy is a benefit to society delivered by private individuals. We think that this should be recognised by the state by ensuring that the actual costs reimbursed in a domestic surrogacy arrangement are exempt from tax and national insurance and excluded from calculations for means-tested benefits. This would be consistent with the tax and benefits treatment of payments related to other societal benefits delivered by private individuals, for example, fostering allowances.

We think that only payments recorded in the official form should be eligible for such exemptions/exclusions. Any payments made beyond the amounts agreed in the official forms would not be eligible, nor would any payments associated with surrogacy arrangements outside the New Pathway since these would not be recorded in the official form. We think that by making eligibility for exemptions/exclusions a feature of the New Pathway only, this should be a strong incentive for all parties to comply with payment rules and to choose the New Pathway over the Parental Order route.

Currently, there is no statutory requirement of HMRC nor the Department of Work and Pensions to make exempt or to exclude a surrogate's reasonable expenses from such calculations. We know of no guidance on such matters available to either surrogates or officials. In the case of benefits, we are told by surrogates that the implications are usually determined at a local level and only on a case-by-case basis when the situation arises. This means that a surrogate normally has to be in receipt of expenses before she can find out if this will affect any means-tested benefits she receives. A decision to treat reimbursed costs as income can have a significant impact on a surrogate's household finances and it is not something that intended parents can easily compensate because any additional payments they make will also be subject to the same rules. We hear that some surrogates sometimes manage their expenses' payments separately from their household income in the hope that this avoids the issue from arising, although others report that that this could be regarded as fraudulent activity.

We know anecdotally that the lack of clarity over the tax and benefits treatment of expenses worries existing surrogates and acts as a major deterrent to women who are thinking of becoming surrogates. We urge the Law Commissions to resolve this matter in their proposals and for HMRC and the Department of Work and Pensions to resolve this urgently by issuing national guidance clarifying how domestic surrogacy expenses should be treated.

4.35 SurrogacyUK supports the enforceability of surrogacy payments by both parties.

SurrogacyUK supports the enforceability of surrogacy payments by both parties

We think that both parties to a surrogacy arrangement should be able to enforce the payment terms. A surrogate should be able to recover all valid costs that the intended parents agreed to pay. The intended parents should be able to recover any payments for which there isn't a valid cost that they have agreed to pay.

We think that only costs and payments that are recorded in the official form should be enforceable by the parties. Any payments made beyond the amounts agreed in the official forms would not be enforceable by them, nor would any payments associated with surrogacy arrangements outside the New Pathway since these would not be recorded in the official form. We think that by making payment enforceability by the parties a feature of the New Pathway only, this should be a strong incentive for all parties to comply with payment rules and to choose the New Pathway over the Parental Order route.

We think enforceability should be contingent on the parties undertaking a surrogacy arrangement in good faith in the New Pathway, but we don't think it should be linked to any pregnancy or legal parenthood milestones. For example, a surrogate should be able to recover costs incurred from a pregnancy that turns out to be unsuccessful or if she decides to exercise her right to object.

4.4 Regulation of Domestic Surrogacy Arrangements

This section sets out our position on regulation of domestic surrogacy arrangements. In forming our position, we have taken the view that Regulated Surrogacy Organisations should become trusted centres of expertise and competence for all matters relating to domestic surrogacy arrangements. Drawing on SurrogacyUK's experience, we know these organisations will perform the important duty of mediating the relationship between the surrogate and intended parents for the duration of their surrogacy arrangement. We therefore think such organisations should have greater substance than that envisaged by the Law Commissions' proposals.

SurrogacyUK Position:

- Significant services provided to domestic surrogacy arrangements should be regulated (Section 4.41)
- Matching and facilitation services, and performing a statutory role in the New Pathway should only be provided by Regulated Surrogacy Organisations (Section 4.41)
- Regulated Surrogacy Organisations should be UK incorporated entities or charities that operate on a not-for-profit basis (Section 4.43)
- Regulated Surrogacy Organisations should be able to decide what types of surrogacy they support and what regulated services they offer (Section 4.44)
- A surrogacy regulator should be established, but thought needs to be given to how regulation is paid for; if this is borne solely by intended parents then surrogacy arrangements might not follow the New Pathway (Section 4.45)

4.41 SurrogacyUK supports the regulation of significant services provided to domestic surrogacy arrangements.

SurrogacyUK supports the regulation of significant services provided to domestic surrogacy arrangements

SurrogacyUK supports the regulation of any activity where an individual or organisation:

1. provides a matching and facilitation service in relation to domestic surrogacy arrangements
2. performs a statutory role in the New Pathway
3. provides another surrogacy-specific service to parties to a domestic surrogacy arrangement

We think the first two types of activities should only be performed by a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation, and the third type of activity could be performed by any individual or organisation that meets the regulatory requirements, such as a counsellor, clinic, solicitor or accountant.

We think the first and last types of activities should be regulated for all domestic surrogacy arrangements, regardless of whether they follow the New Pathway or Parental Order route. The issues and risks around these activities that regulation would seek to manage are the same regardless of which pathway is pursued. Moreover, it would be extremely confusing to individuals seeking a surrogacy arrangement if similar services were offered on a regulated and unregulated basis.

Matching and Facilitation

SurrogacyUK thinks that matching and facilitation should include any activities to establish, support or mediate the relationship between a surrogate and intended parents from the point they come into contact with the organisation until the legal parenthood of any child they produce is settled or their surrogacy arrangement has otherwise ended. This matching and facilitating activity would include:

- compiling and/or publishing personal details of surrogates and intended parents for the purposes of a surrogacy arrangement
- facilitating the formation of surrogacy arrangements between surrogates and intended parents by introducing, liaising, promoting or recommending parties to each other
- facilitating, negotiating or advising the agreement of a surrogacy arrangement between parties
- supporting or mediating the relationship between a surrogate and intended parents
- the administration necessary for, and ancillary to, the above services

Private interactions between individuals should not be regulated. We do not think that the provision of social events and online spaces for surrogates and intended parents to interact as private individuals should be considered to be regulated matching and facilitation services, unless the administrators/managers of such events undertake these in conjunction with other regulated matching and facilitation activities. This would allow groups of individuals to continue to interact using social media and to meet in person for the purposes of forming and supporting surrogacy arrangements, without having to fulfil the regulatory obligations of being a regulated surrogacy organisation.

Statutory Role on New Pathway

SurrogacyUK thinks the surrogacy-specific statutory role in the New Pathway should include:

- screening surrogates and intended parents for legal and regulatory eligibility to follow the pathway
- undertaking a suitability-for-surrogacy assessment of surrogates and intended parents (Section 4.52)
- undertaking a welfare-of-child assessment of intended parents in traditional surrogacy arrangements
- witnessing surrogacy agreements, legal parenthood consents and payment consents

4.42 SurrogacyUK thinks the provision of surrogacy-specific services to parties should meet regulatory or professional standards or guidelines.

SurrogacyUK thinks the provision of surrogacy-specific services to parties should meet regulatory or professional standards or guidelines

There are a range of other services that would help to make a surrogacy arrangement on the new pathway a success, but which do not directly involve facilitating or mediating the arrangement, or performing a statutory role on the new pathway. We think such services need not be performed by a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation, but should meet certain regulatory or professional standards or guidelines for surrogacy. This is to ensure that the service providers have the experience and competence to deal with surrogacy specific matters and that their activities don't inadvertently compromise the autonomy of the parties to the surrogacy arrangement.

Such services would include:

- Counselling, in areas such as: surrogacy, fertility, genetics and birth
- Medical screening and treatment from before conception to the birth and beyond
- Antenatal education and birth support
- Legal advice, representation in court, and legal services such as preparation of wills
- Accounting and financial services, such as escrow accounts or income protection insurance

We think the surrogacy-related guidelines for clinics and counsellors that have been added to the latest HFEA Code of Practice are a good example of how this can be delivered.

4.43 SurrogacyUK agrees that surrogacy organisations should be regulated and operate on a not-for-profit basis.

SurrogacyUK agrees that surrogacy organisations should be regulated and operate on a not-for-profit basis

SurrogacyUK welcomes the proposal to establish Regulated Surrogacy Organisations and that only these organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services. We suggest this restriction also be extended to performing the statutory role in the New Pathway. This is because people seeking surrogacy arrangements, the state and society must have confidence that the assessments are being made by competent organisations.

We agree with the proposal that such organisations continue to operate on a not-for-profit basis. This means they should not be controlled or influenced by any other entities or individuals that could profit from the regulated services they undertake. Additionally, the contractual relationships and internal policies and practices that such organisations have must not undermine the autonomy of any party to a surrogacy arrangement. They must offer no inducement, reward, penalty or other terms to surrogates, intended parents, employees or third parties to influence participation in, or the outcome of, a surrogacy arrangement.

SurrogacyUK thinks that the significant role and breadth of responsibilities of Regulated Surrogacy Organisations means these entities should be incorporated and/or charities in the UK and be run by individuals who meet the associated governance requirements. Based on our own experience, we expect that such organisations would require employees, contracts, insurance and so forth in order to operate, which would suggest a need for such legal forms.

4.44 SurrogacyUK supports clear accountability within an organisation for meeting regulatory standards and sanctions if this doesn't happen.

SurrogacyUK supports clear accountability within an organisation for meeting regulatory standards and sanctions if this doesn't happen

SurrogacyUK would most likely seek to become a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation and we would want to offer a full range of matching and facilitation services for all types of surrogacy, as well as perform the statutory role on the New Pathway that we describe above. However, we think it should be possible for a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation to focus on a specific type of surrogacy, e.g. traditional surrogacy only, or to restrict its activity, e.g. only undertaking activities that help surrogates and intended parents to meet or only supporting surrogacy arrangements after the parties have already met. This might enable the "Independent Professional" role that the Law Commissions propose to participate in the new Pathway, whilst meeting the same regulatory standards as other organisations. The compliance framework should be designed in such a way as to allow this to happen and for portability of data to enable surrogates and intended parents to engage different organisations at different points on the New Pathway.

We agree in principle that there should be clear accountability within an organisation for complying with regulation, but we do not hold a specific view as to how this should work nor what the responsibilities of those who hold accountability should be; we think this should be determined by the new regulator. Neither do we have a view as to who should be the regulator; whether this a new independent body or an existing regulator. We have no objection to the HFEA being the regulator, and can see synergy between surrogacy regulation and the Authority's regulation of other forms of assisted reproduction. Whoever the regulator turns out to be, we think they should look at the regulatory needs of surrogacy from first principles so that a fit-for-purpose regulatory framework is established. We don't, therefore, assume that if the HFEA were to be the regulator that their existing model of regulation should be extended to surrogacy.

In terms of sanctions, we think that Regulated Surrogacy Organisations that fail to meet their regulatory obligations should face regulatory penalties including the possibility of losing their licence to operate. Moreover, SurrogacyUK thinks that unlawful activities by individuals and organisations should be a criminal offence. This should include false representation as a surrogate or a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation. The severity of the sanctions should reflect the fact that surrogacy involves (potentially) vulnerable people, children and significant sums of money.

4.45 SurrogacyUK is concerned that passing regulatory costs to intended parents could deter surrogacy arrangements from following the New Pathway.

SurrogacyUK is concerned that passing regulatory costs to intended parents could deter surrogacy arrangements from following the New Pathway

There will, of course, be costs associated with good regulation, incurred both by the regulator and the surrogacy organisations it regulates. There are several concerns that SurrogacyUK would like to raise around this:

1. Given the relatively small number of domestic surrogacy arrangements, applying the “customer pays” principle to the regulator’s costs (such as is applied by the HFEA today) could place an extremely high cost burden on intended parents. By way of illustration, if the HFEA were to be the regulator and were to employ just one more person to cover surrogacy regulation, then the cost of funding this role could be around £550 per domestic surrogacy arrangement¹⁵. Compare this to the £80 HFEA fee that is collected on each IVF cycle today.
2. In addition, there is the cost of organisations themselves complying with the regulatory requirements, such as introducing the Statutory Role on the New Pathway or reporting to the regulator. Depending on what’s required, SurrogacyUK might - for example - need to:
 - a. upgrade an existing senior role to become accountable to the regulator
 - b. increase staff time to perform the Statutory Role and undertake reporting to the regulator
 - c. increase our compliance training budget.

It’s not unreasonable to estimate that our costs could increase by £50,000+, which would cost our members £300 per annum¹⁶. This is significant when compared to our £50 annual membership renewal fee.

We think the current, relatively low volumes of domestic surrogacy arrangements and the potentially high fixed costs of regulation, mean that the regulatory costs could end up being highly disproportionate relative to organisations’ costs of operating the New pathway. If all costs are recovered from intended parents then this risks encouraging surrogacy arrangements to follow the (much cheaper) Parental Order route instead.

¹⁵ HFEA Business Plan 2019/20; budget £7,058m divided by 68 staff equals £104k per member of staff. 382 parental orders in 2018; assume 50% domestic, equals 191 domestic parental orders. If all domestic parental orders follow New Pathway then cost per arrangement equals £545.

¹⁶ Calculation: £50,000 regulatory costs per annum divided by 160 currently active intended parent solo/couple members of SurrogacyUK equals £313 per intended parent solo/couple per annum

We would like the Law Commissions, when giving further consideration to statutory regulatory requirements, to give thought to how the cost implications of their proposals might be minimised and how these costs will be funded, other than by intended parents alone.

4.5 Other Thoughts on The New Pathway

This section sets out our position on other significant proposals in relation to domestic surrogacy arrangements that have not been covered elsewhere in Section 4.

4.51 SurrogacyUK proposes further incentives to encourage domestic surrogacy arrangements to follow the New Pathway over the Parental Order Route.

SurrogacyUK proposes further incentives to encourage domestic surrogacy arrangements to follow the New Pathway over the Parental Order Route

SurrogacyUK shares the view of the Law Commissions that the biggest incentive to using the New Pathway will be the recognition at birth of the intended parents as the legal parents of the child. We also agree that making reimbursement of expenses enforceable by surrogates is a reasonable incentive.

We do think, however, there is a risk that the New Pathway isn't attractive enough to some surrogates and intended parents, who would continue to use the reformed parental order route. In our 2019 Survey we asked respondents which pathway they were likely to use¹⁷: 66% of surrogates and 78% of intended parent stated the New Pathway. Perhaps these numbers weren't higher because this is still only an abstract concept to most people at this stage, but there were some negative responses from a small minority. Most respondents to our survey were members of SurrogacyUK and are used to our rules and modest fees but we think the new process might not be popular with surrogates and intended parents currently operating on an independent basis. Sometimes our Members choose to pursue an independent arrangement as they wish to opt out of our processes or do not wish to pay recurring fees for a sibling arrangement, which may indicate how people will feel about mandatory requirements and paying for regulatory costs in the New Pathway.

We think there are additional incentives for the New Pathway which the Law Commissions should consider:

- Removing the surrogate's automatic right to become the mother and ensure that intended parents retain legal parenthood unless a court decides otherwise (Section 4.24)
- Allowing intended parents - in addition to surrogates - to enforce aspects of the payment terms (Section 4.35)
- Enabling payments in the new pathway to be excluded from a surrogate's tax, national insurance and means-tested benefits calculations (Section 4.34)
- Removing the mandatory requirement for independent legal advice (Section 4.56)
- Mandating that clinics should only treat surrogacy patients on the New Pathway, which would bring all gestational surrogacy and traditional surrogacy using IUI and IVF into the pathway

¹⁷ Appendix 1, Chart 16

- Seeking alternative ways of funding the cost of regulation that doesn't make using the New Pathway more expensive (see Section 4.45)
- Recovering the cost of Cafcass activities from parental order applicants

4.52 SurrogacyUK proposes the introduction of a suitability-for-surrogacy assessment of surrogates and intended parents in the New Pathway.

SurrogacyUK proposes the introduction of a suitability-for-surrogacy assessment of surrogates and intended parents in the New Pathway

Not everyone is capable of having a successful surrogacy arrangement. A surrogate needs to be able to carry a successful pregnancy and, if she is using her own eggs, she must be fertile. If the intended parents are planning to use their own gametes then they should be fertile too, or have made provisions to use donated gametes. All parties should also have considered the practical and emotional implications of a surrogacy arrangement on their lives and relationships.

Most people, of course, work this out themselves and only opt-in to surrogacy or enter into an arrangement with someone else if they think it is going to succeed. However, SurrogacyUK knows from experience that some people do not make a reasonable assessment of their situation or they require the support of others to do this. If SurrogacyUK has any concerns about prospective surrogates or intended parents, we advise them how these can be addressed or, sometimes refuse their application, pointing them to other options, if appropriate. This is an important part of our screening process and around one third of surrogate applicants do not end up joining our organisation. We think other organisations and people in independent arrangements also perform similar checks to varying degrees.

We think prospective surrogates and intended parents should undergo a suitability-for-surrogacy assessment to ensure that both parties are reasonably capable of delivering their surrogacy intentions and that there isn't a significant risk of harm to either party or their existing children. Whilst we think that requirements should be set by the regulator our own current practice suggests that factors to consider should include:

- Medical suitability, for traditional and gestational surrogacy.
- Surrogacy implications awareness
- Welfare-of-child matters
- Safeguarding matters

The regulator should ensure standardisation and portability of checks and screening undertaken by Regulated Surrogacy Organisations and by others, especially clinics, so that surrogates and intended parents do not need to spend time and money unnecessarily repeating these activities.

Similarly, experienced surrogates and intended parents question the value of repeated screening for factors that are unlikely to change in subsequent surrogacy arrangements, particularly when the same parties are trying to create a sibling.

4.53 SurrogacyUK proposes official forms be introduced for parties to use when recording their consent to statutory legal parenthood and payment requirements.

SurrogacyUK proposes official forms be introduced to record consent to statutory parenthood and payment requirements

SurrogacyUK thinks form and function go together regarding the recording of statutory consent in surrogacy arrangements. We think that where possible, standardised forms and associated guidance in plain English should be provided, following best practice that exists elsewhere today. This would allow parties to a surrogacy arrangement to record their consent without the need to incur costs and expend effort by instructing a lawyer to prepare documents for the same purpose. We think this should be sufficient for most straightforward surrogacy arrangements, but that it shouldn't stop parties from creating bespoke legal documents that have a similar effect if there is a wish or a need to do so.

There may also be situations where the parties need to demonstrate that legal parenthood or payment consent has been given and we imagine that it would be preferable to use standard official forms in such circumstances.

4.54 SurrogacyUK agrees surrogacy agreements should be mandatory, unenforceable written documents.

SurrogacyUK agrees surrogacy agreements should be mandatory, unenforceable written documents

SurrogacyUK is pleased that the Law Commissions are proposing that the preparation of written surrogacy agreements should be mandatory and that these documents should continue to be unenforceable.

In our view, in future a surrogacy agreement should be more accurately thought of – and known as – a “Surrogacy Plan”, since this better reflects its purpose of recording the voluntary actions that parties intend to take during their surrogacy arrangement in order to produce a child. A surrogacy plan should be a separate, but related document to the documentary evidence that is needed to demonstrate that the parties meet all eligibility requirements and that they have provided their consents to the statutory legal parenthood and payments requirements.

We think a written Surrogacy Plan should be the culmination of a process that surrogates and intended parents have followed to reach a shared understanding of their intentions, hopefully building an empathetic and resilient relationship along the way.

The points for discussion and agreement when preparing the plan would normally include:

- what should happen in the pregnancy from trying to conceive to the birth, such as any decisions that intended parents would have had to take if they were trying to carry their own child, covering both lifestyle and medical treatment matters.
- expectations for the relationship between the parties during the pregnancy and beyond. This should include how decision-making should work and how personal information should be handled.

Today such a document often serves as a guidance note for third parties, giving service providers confidence about how the parties to a surrogacy arrangement would like to be treated when a service is being delivered to them. For example, it usually includes a birth plan that sets out how the unique circumstances of the birth should be handled by healthcare professionals. We think this is useful and should continue.

We appreciate that under the current legal framework, such a document usually covers intentions towards legal parenthood and payment, but in future these matters will, of course, be covered by the law once surrogates and intended parents have given their statutory consent. There will be no need for the intended parents to commit in the agreement to making payments, for example, as these will be enforceable in law.

Given the proposed roles and responsibilities of Regulated Surrogacy Organisations on the New Pathway - as discussed in Section 4.4 - SurrogacyUK thinks that such organisations would have the right experience and competence to support the preparation of Surrogacy Plans. Whilst surrogates or intended parents should, of course, be able to seek legal advice when preparing their plans, we do not see why this would be particularly useful in most situations and we strongly disagree that seeking independent legal advice should be mandated, as we discuss in more detail in Section 4.56.

4.55 SurrogacyUK proposes the introduction of a mandatory four week period between giving consent to a surrogacy arrangement in the New Pathway and trying to conceive.

SurrogacyUK proposes the introduction of a mandatory four week period between giving consent to a surrogacy arrangement in the New Pathway and trying to conceive

SurrogacyUK knows, from supporting almost 250 successful surrogacy arrangements, that once a surrogate and intended parents meet there is often a tremendous desire from both parties to make things happen as quickly as possible. We feel that moving at speed can often be at the expense of sound judgment regarding suitability for a surrogacy arrangement, particularly where the parties haven't known each other for very long. At SurrogacyUK, we require surrogates and intended parents to wait three months from when they meet until they start trying to conceive, this time is used to get to know each other better and prepare their surrogacy agreement with less time pressure. We think that slowing things down is vital. A significant number of our proposed surrogacy arrangements end during this period (an average of six per year, compared to 20-25 surrogacy arrangements that, at any one time, are normally at the stage before trying to conceive). We see this as a positive and important safeguard: better to break up before conception than suffer a difficult surrogacy relationship afterwards, when the implications will be much more significant.

We think these relationship challenges are not unique to SurrogacyUK-supported arrangements, so we suggest that a mandatory period be introduced between giving consent to a surrogacy arrangement on the New Pathway and trying to conceive. This would give the parties time to reflect on the statutory consents they have made and the agreement they have prepared.

4.56 SurrogacyUK disagrees with the proposal for mandatory independent legal advice.

SurrogacyUK disagrees with the proposal for mandatory independent legal advice

SurrogacyUK does not agree that surrogates and intended parents must seek independent legal advice on the New Pathway. We do not think this is needed as a safeguard when giving consent, nor do we think that the legal implications of surrogacy are complicated enough to warrant this for most surrogacy arrangements. We do think, however, that Regulated Surrogacy Organisations should have a duty to identify arrangements that they think need legal input, and - of course - surrogates and intended parents should be able to seek legal advice whenever they see fit.

Surrogates and intended parents must all have capacity to give their consent to a surrogacy arrangement and must give it without any undue influence. We think that providing consent is a continuous process that starts when surrogates and intended parents first contact a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation and stops once the surrogate's right to object ceases or the surrogacy arrangement otherwise comes to an end.

A Regulated Surrogacy Organisation is the only third party the Law Commissions propose would come into contact with surrogates and intended parents for the full duration of a surrogacy arrangement, i.e. from matching and facilitating right through until the right to object to legal parenthood is expired. These will be the only organisations that conduct the suitability checks and work with both surrogate and intended parents - not for one side or the other - and therefore they can form a view around consent. Given the nature of these services, SurrogacyUK thinks it must be a licence-to-operate requirement that such organisations have the competence and processes in place to check that the parties to a surrogacy arrangement provide their consent on an on-going basis and to verify this, for legal parenthood and payment purposes, at the point that statutory consent is provided. If this duty were placed on solicitors instead then we think this could undermine the quality of supervision provided by surrogacy organisations to matching and facilitation activities.

It is suggested by the Law Commissions that there are parallels between the requirement for independent legal advice for preparing pre-nuptial agreements and their proposed similar requirement for surrogacy arrangements. We don't share this view; in the case of a surrogacy arrangement, Registered Surrogacy Organisations are supporting and supervising any consents and informal agreements being made by the parties, whilst there is no equivalent third party involved with couples when they discuss what should happen if their future marriage breaks down.

Surrogates and intended parents must also be able to demonstrate that the arrangement meets the eligibility criteria for making the statutory consents. Based on our experience of supporting surrogacy arrangements in the current legal framework, we think that the eligibility criteria for following the New Pathway and the legal implications of the consents provided are straightforward for most people to understand without the need for professional legal advice. Most of our members do not seek legal advice for their surrogacy arrangements today and most simple queries are dealt with in the Department of Health and Social Security guidance and by our representatives. We are not aware of this approach causing any issues regarding a misunderstanding of the law when parental order applications are considered in court.

Only 32% of responders to the SurrogacyUK 2019 Survey said that legal advice should be mandated¹⁸. We think the estimated £1,000 costs of this advice would be unnecessarily spent in most surrogacy arrangements and might deter some from following the New Pathway.

We suggest that supervising consent and checking legal eligibility should be a core competence of Regulated Surrogacy Organisations. Legal understanding could be supported by new, standard guidance provided by the Department of Health and Social Care or the regulator, alongside clear, standard forms to complete for the statutory Legal Parenthood and Payment consents. We think there should be a requirement for Regulated Surrogacy Organisations to undertake reasonable checks on legal understanding and to complete a risk assessment of legal matters related to a surrogacy arrangement, advising parties to seek independent legal advice where this is felt to be needed.

5. OUR RESPONSE TO THE CONSULTATION QUESTIONS

This section sets out SurrogacyUK's response to the specific questions asked by the Law Commissions in their consultation paper.

We have answered the questions as if our proposal for legal reform in Section 3 were to be adopted. We would have answered some of them differently if the Law Commissions decide to adopt a different approach to legal parenthood or payments than we have presumed in our answers. Our specific views on possible different approaches to legal parenthood and payments are expressed in Section 4.

We have responded to the questions posed by the Law Commissions that we feel are relevant to SurrogacyUK's activities and where we can make a useful contribution. We have omitted others where we have no comments to make beyond those already made by the SurrogacyUK Working Group for Surrogacy Law Reform in their submission.

Section	Question	Response
5.1	Consultation Question 2 19.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales (1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and (2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.	19.2 SurrogacyUK thinks that such cases should be heard by a District Judge since these are more likely to be problematic domestic surrogacy arrangements that do not meet the eligibility criteria of the New Pathway. This is on the assumption that most or all domestic surrogacy arrangements that are eligible for the New Pathway will follow it.
5.2	Consultation Question 4 19.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings. Do consultees agree? (Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in	19.4 SurrogacyUK agrees.

	the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).
5.3	Consultation Question 5 19.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise. Do consultees agree?	19.5 SurrogacyUK agrees.
5.4	Consultation Question 6 19.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland: (1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed; (2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or (3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.	19.6(1) In SurrogacyUK's experience, officers' expenses range from £1000 to over £3000, with these fees being met by the public purse in some sheriffdoms and the applicant in others. This difference in approach, both within Scotland and with the rest of the UK (where such fees are not charged to the applicant), doesn't seem fair or appropriate to us. 19.6(2) We think Scottish courts should have the explicit powers to make such arrangements, if needed. As we have argued elsewhere in our response, this would enable parental rights and responsibilities to better align with the intent of surrogacy arrangements in the period until an application to be determined. 19.6(3) Our Scottish members tell us that once the petition is lodged with the court in Scotland the Parental Order process is straightforward and the four-week timescale within which the report has to be issued is, in many cases, quicker than the equivalent report in England and Wales. A relatively small number of petitions have been made to Scottish courts, however, so the procedure hasn't been tested in all scenarios, for example, contested cases.
5.5	Consultation Question 7 19.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have: (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,	19.7 SurrogacyUK does not agree. SurrogacyUK thinks that in domestic surrogacy arrangement the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child at birth as long as requirements 19.7(1)-(3) have been met. The intended parents legal parenthood should not be withdrawn automatically if the surrogate exercises

	(2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and (3) met eligibility requirements, on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object. Do consultees agree?	her right to object and she should only be able to obtain legal parenthood through a judicial process. See Section 4.2 for more information on our position.
5.6	Consultation Question 8 19.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period. Do consultees agree? 19.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.	19.8 SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.9 SurrogacyUK thinks the time period should be the same as for record keeping at fertility clinics, which we understand to be 30 years.
5.7	Consultation Question 9 19.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved. Do consultees agree?	19.10 SurrogacyUK agrees. The same rules should apply to gamete donors at regulated surrogacy organisations as apply to gamete donors using clinics. See Section 4.1 for more information on our position.
5.8	Consultation Question 10 19.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.	19.11 SurrogacyUK thinks that a traditional domestic surrogacy arrangement using anonymously donated sperm should be prohibited from entering the new pathway since the same rules should apply as to gamete donors using clinics. Outside the new pathway, SurrogacyUK thinks that the parties must satisfy the courts that they had agreed their surrogacy intent prior to conception. See Section 4.1 for more information on our position.
5.9	Consultation Question 11 19.12 We provisionally propose that: (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child; (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and	19.12(1) SurrogacyUK agrees, subject to consideration being given to the right to object ending at birth as well as a fixed period after birth. 19.12(2) SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.12(3) SurrogacyUK thinks that the birth registration should be decoupled from the right to object so that the intended parents can register the birth regardless of the status of the right to object. See Section 4.2 for more

	(3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week. Do consultees agree?	information on our position.
5.10	Consultation Question 12 19.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that: (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child; (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood. Do consultees agree?	19.13 SurrogacyUK does not agree. We think the intended parents should acquire legal parenthood at birth and retain this until a court decides otherwise. There should be a legal process that can be initiated if the surrogate wishes to request legal parenthood. See Section 4.2 for more information on our position.
5.11	Consultation Question 13 19.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway: (1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood; (2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and (3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order. Do consultees agree?	19.14 SurrogacyUK does not agree. This would not be relevant under our proposal that the intended parents retain legal parenthood during the period in which the surrogate has a right to object and, if she objects, until the court makes a decision. See Section 4.2 for more information on our position.
5.12	Consultation Question 14 19.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement: (1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;	19.15 SurrogacyUK agrees.

Section	Question	Response
	(2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and (3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth. Do consultees agree?
5.13	Consultation Question 15 19.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child. Do consultees agree? 19.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.	19.16 SurrogacyUK doesn't agree with the context of the question. We think that if a surrogate wishes to become a legal parent then she should apply to a court to obtain legal parenthood for herself and her spouse or civil partner, if appropriate. 19.17 SurrogacyUK thinks that for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, then the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should not normally be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.
5.14	Consultation Question 16 19.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn: (1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and (2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object. Do consultees agree? 19.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth. Do consultees agree?	19.18 SurrogacyUK disagrees. In the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, then the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless a court decision is made otherwise. 19.19 SurrogacyUK agrees. See Section 4.2 for more information on our position.

	should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth. Do consultees agree?
5.16	Consultation Question 18 19.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.	19.21 SurrogacyUK thinks intended parents should acquire legal parenthood at birth. This is consistent with our view that the intended parents should be the legal parents unless a court decides otherwise. See Section 4.2 for more information on our position.
5.17	Consultation Question 19 19.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period. Do consultees agree? 19.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made: (1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989: (a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and (b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or (2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.	19.22 SurrogacyUK disagrees, instead the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents until a court decides otherwise. 19.23(1) SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.23(2) SurrogacyUK does not agree. See Section 4.2 for more information on our position.

Section	Question	Response
5.18	Consultation Question 20 19.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A: (1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent; (2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and (3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court. Do consultees agree?	19.24 SurrogacyUK disagrees. We think the law should be modelled on what would happen when a solo parent registers the birth of a child that was conceived naturally and carried by her. In this scenario, she would be legally obliged to register the father of the child if she knew who this was. Since this is deemed to be in the interests of the child in this scenario, then we think it is also in the interests of a child born through surrogacy. If we take this as the starting point then: 19.24(1) the applicant should not have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order, but instead they would be legally required to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent if there was one party to the surrogacy arrangement that resulted in the birth of the child. 19.24(2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, then that person must be party to the parental order unless they can demonstrate that they withdrew from the surrogacy arrangement. 19.24(3) this is not valid in this situation. SurrogacyUK thinks that this provision should be applicable to both solo and couple intended parents, i.e. in the case of a couple, they should declare if another intended parent had been party to the surrogacy arrangement that produced a birth. We think, however, that it should be possible to vary a surrogacy agreement until the point of conception, as long as this has the consent of all parties. This would allow for an intended parent who no longer wishes to be party to the surrogacy arrangement to be removed from the agreement. If one party unilaterally removes themselves from the agreement then it should become void.

Section	Question	Response
5.19	Consultation Question 21 19.25 We invite consultees' views as to: (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.	19.25 SurrogacyUK does not think a temporary three parent model of legal parenthood should exist in surrogacy arrangements. We do not think it reflects the shared intentions of surrogates and intended parents in practice.
5.20	Consultation Question 22 19.26 We invite consultees' views: (1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and (2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be: (a) administrative, or (b) judicial.	19.26 SurrogacyUK thinks there should be a suitability for surrogacy check for surrogates and intended parents. This should be an administrative check performed by Regulated Surrogacy Organisations, with the regulator providing guidance on the requirements.
5.21	Consultation Question 23 19.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and (2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.	19.27 SurrogacyUK thinks that, given the language used by some judges in recent surrogacy cases about the need to best reflect the child's 'true identity' (or similar), it is possible that this should be a factor that should be considered. This would also reflect Art8 of UNCRC, which states 'States Parties undertake to respect the right of the child to preserve his or her identity, including nationality, name and family relations as recognised by law without unlawful interference'. Though this might be considered to come under 'emotional needs' (S1(3)(b)) or 'background' (S1(3)(d)), it could be that this should be spelled out more clearly (though perhaps in guidance to interpretation of S1(3)).
5.22	Consultation Question 24 19.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views: (1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and (2) what those additional factors should be.	19.28 SurrogacyUK agrees with the principles contained within the checklist but, as these are written for adoption cases, we would prefer for a surrogacy checklist to be written into the new law/Code of Practice, so as to avoid conflation of surrogacy with adoption.

5.23	Consultation Question 25 19.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.	19.29 SurrogacyUK agrees.
5.24	Consultation Question 26 19.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where: (1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and (2) they intend to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?	19.30 SurrogacyUK agrees.
5.25	Consultation Question 27 19.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway: (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?	19.31(1) SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.31(2) SurrogacyUK does not agree with the process that is proposed if the surrogate exercises her right to object. In such situations, we think that the intended parents should continue to be the legal parents of the child and have parental responsibility. This should be the case until such time as the surrogate obtains a court order otherwise. See Section 4.2 for more information on our position.
5.26	Consultation Question 28 19.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object. Do consultees agree?	19.32 SurrogacyUK does not agree. It does not reflect the reality of surrogacy practice nor the wishes of surrogates or intended parents when they have been surveyed on this matter. See Section 4.2 for more information on our position.
5.27	Consultation Question 29 19.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.	19.33 SurrogacyUK does not think that parental responsibility should be shared, but instead only the intended parents should have parental responsibility unless a court order is obtained otherwise. See section 4.2 for more information on our position.

5.28	Consultation Question 30 19.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?	19.34 SurrogacyUK agrees and thinks that all domestic surrogacy arrangements, with the exception of those using anonymous gametes, should be brought in the scope of the new pathway.
5.29	Consultation Question 32 19.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway. 19.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.	19.36 SurrogacyUK thinks that all domestic surrogacy arrangements, with the exception of those using anonymous gametes, should be in the scope of the New Pathway. 19.37 People who meet independently could use a regulated surrogacy organisation to meet the requirements of the new pathway.
5.30	Consultation Question 33 19.38 We provisionally propose that: (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations; (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation. Do consultees agree?	19.38(1) SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.38(2) SurrogacyUK doesn't agree, but instead thinks they should be incorporated and/or charities in the UK. 19.38(3) SurrogacyUK agrees in principle. See Section 4.4 for more information on our position.
5.31	Consultation Question 34 19.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for: (1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator; (2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill; (3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures; (4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and (5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law. Do consultees agree? 19.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have. 19.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.	19.39 SurrogacyUK agrees with this proposal in principle, but suggests that in practice the person(s) accountable and the list of responsibilities be determined by the regulator. See Section 4.4 for more information on our position.

Section	Question	Response
5.32	Consultation Question 35 19.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies. Do consultees agree?	19.42 SurrogacyUK agrees. See Section 4.4 for more information on our position.
5.33	Consultation Question 36 19.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.	19.43 SurrogacyUK view is set out in Section 4.4.
5.34	Consultation Question 37 19.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway. Do consultees agree? 19.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.	19.44 SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.45 SurrogacyUK view is set out in Section 4.4.
5.35	Consultation Question 38 19.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.	19.46 SurrogacyUK's view is set out in Section 4.4
5.36	Consultation Question 39 19.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood. Do consultees agree? 19.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.	19.47 SurrogacyUK neither agrees or disagrees. See Section 4.4 for more information on our position. 19.48 SurrogacyUK thinks the regulator should determine the best way to set duties and standards, and monitors compliance in surrogacy. Whilst Section 14 of the HFEA's Code of Practice already applies to surrogacy, a different approach to clinical regulation may well be required when the full range of regulated activities offered by Regulated Surrogacy Organisations is considered.
5.37	Consultation Question 40 19.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms). Do consultees agree?	19.49 SurrogacyUK agrees. See Section 4.5 for more information on our position.

Section	Question	Response
5.38	Consultation Question 41 19.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?	19.50 SurrogacyUK agrees, subject to the requirement that any service that is provided by a Regulated Surrogacy Organisation is done so on a not-for-profit basis. See Section 4.4 for more information on our position.
5.39	Consultation Question 42 19.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?	19.51 SurrogacyUK agrees.
5.40	Consultation Question 43 19.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18. Do consultees agree?	19.52 SurrogacyUK agrees.
5.41	Consultation Question 44 19.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement. Do consultees agree?	19.53 SurrogacyUK thinks the legal parents of a child born through surrogacy should be recorded as the parents on the birth certificate. We think that a decision on whether to include any other surrogacy-related information, however, should be considered as part of a wider review of the birth registration system, taking into account what information will appear on the proposed National Register of Surrogacy Arrangements.
5.42	Consultation Question 45 19.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.	19.54 SurrogacyUK thinks that the birth registration system requires reform to at least be able to accommodate the legal parenthood scenarios that arise from a domestic surrogacy arrangement. Consideration should also be given as to whether other surrogacy-related information should be included, taking into account what information will appear on the proposed National Register of Surrogacy Arrangements.

Section	Question	Response
5.44	Consultation Question 47 19.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors. Do consultees agree? 19.57 We provisionally propose that: (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority; (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include: (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies. Do consultees agree?	19.56 SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.57 SurrogacyUK agrees, subject to the same principles applying to the surrogacy register as to the existing donor register.
5.45	Consultation Question 48 19.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.	119.58 SurrogacyUK agrees, subject to the same principles applying to the surrogacy register as to the existing donor register.
5.46	Consultation Question 49 19.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request. Do consultees agree? 19.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:	119.59 SurrogacyUK agrees, subject to the same principles should apply to the surrogacy register as to the existing donor register. 119.60 SurrogacyUK thinks the same principles should apply to the surrogacy register as to the existing donor register.

5.47	Consultation Question 50 19.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.	19.61 SurrogacyUK thinks this is only relevant in traditional surrogacy arrangements and we support this provision in such situations for both the children born through surrogacy and the surrogate's own children
5.48	Consultation Question 51 19.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so. Do consultees agree? 19.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.	19.62 SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.63 SurrogacyUK agrees.
5.49	Consultation Question 52 19.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so: (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.	19.64 SurrogacyUK supports this in both scenarios.
5.50	Consultation Question 53 19.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.	19.65 SurrogacyUK thinks the law should be modelled on what would happen when a solo parent registers the birth of a child that was conceived naturally and carried by her. In this scenario, she would be legally obliged to register the father of the child if she knew who this was. Since this is deemed to be in the interests of the child in this scenario, then we think it is also in the interests of a child born through

If we take this as the starting point then: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - the applicant should not have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order, but instead they would be legally required to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent if such a person was party to the surrogacy arrangement that resulted in the birth of the child. - if details of another intended parent are supplied, then that person must be party to the parental order unless they can demonstrate that they withdrew from the surrogacy arrangement.
5.51	Consultation Question 54 19.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished. Do consultees agree?	19.66 SurrogacyUK doesn't agree, but instead thinks that the wording should say that the time limit is normally six months. This is to encourage timely applications, which are in the interests of the child, but doesn't preclude late applications.
5.52	Consultation Question 55 19.67 We provisionally propose that: (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available; (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances: (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland)	19.67 SurrogacyUK agrees.

5.53	Consultation Question 56 19.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man. Do consultees agree? 19.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.	19.68 SurrogacyUK agrees. We also think the surrogate should normally be domiciled in the UK 19.69 SurrogacyUK thinks the test should be designed to reduce the risk of overseas intended parents coming here with the intention of leaving again when the child is born. See Section 4.1 for more details on our position.
5.54	Consultation Question 57 19.70 We invite consultees' views on whether: (1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or (2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.	19.70 SurrogacyUK thinks that the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.
5.55	Consultation Question 58 19.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them. Do consultees agree?	19.71 SurrogacyUK agrees, subject to a flexible definition of "home".
5.56	Consultation Question 59 19.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway – (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility. Do consultees agree? 19.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements. 19.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the	19.72(1) SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.72(2) SurrogacyUK does not agree that double donation of gametes should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity. In the SurrogacyUK 2019 Survey there near universal - support for a medical necessity requirement for double donation (Appendix 1, Chart 18) and a small minority of our Legal Reform Project Team and Board of Trustees also felt that there should be a medical necessity requirement. As an organisation, however, we note that there is no such medical requirement for double donation in cases where a woman can carry a child and we have concluded that it is important that the same legal principle should apply to double donation in surrogacy. We therefore

	conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements. Do consultees agree?	do not think there should be a statutory requirement of medical necessity for using donated gametes/embryos in surrogacy, but instead that the reasons for seeking double donation should be considered as a factor in screening before conception in the New Pathway. We don't think this will be a common occurrence and we think each case should be considered on its own merits. 19.73 SurrogacyUK thinks that surrogacy with double donation of gametes should be permitted under the parental order pathway if the parties can satisfy the courts that they had agreed their surrogacy intent prior to conception. See Section 4.1 for more information on our position.
5.57	Consultation Question 60 19.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order. Do consultees agree?	19.75 SurrogacyUK does not agree that the requirements for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, but instead that the parties must satisfy the courts that surrogacy intent was agreed prior to conception in order to qualify for a parental order. See Section 4.1 for more information on our position.
5.58	Consultation Question 61 19.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order. Do consultees agree?	19.76 SurrogacyUK doesn't agree. We don't think this requirement is necessary since we think the former partner should be a legal parent of the child and be the second applicant for the parental order. See our answer to Question 5.56 for more details.
5.59	Consultation Question 62 19.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity: (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.	19.77 SurrogacyUK does not think that surrogacy arrangements should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity. In the SurrogacyUK 2019 Survey there was strong - but not universal - support for a medical necessity requirement for surrogacy (Appendix 1, Chart 17). A significant minority

As an organisation, however, we concluded that it was more important that the same legal principle should apply to surrogacy as to other forms of assisted reproduction. We therefore do not think there should be a statutory requirement of medical necessity for surrogacy in either pathway, but instead that the reasons for seeking surrogacy should be considered as a factor in screening before conception in the New Pathway. We don't think this will be a common occurrence and we think each case should be considered on its own merits.
5.60	Consultation Question 63 19.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth. Do consultees agree? 19.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that: (1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or (2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence. 19.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements. Do consultees agree?	19.79 SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.80 SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.81 SurrogacyUK agrees.

In the Parental Order route, the court should be satisfied that all parties were 18 and had agreed their surrogacy intent prior to conception. 19.86 SurrogacyUK agrees. In the New Pathway, this would be satisfied by the mandatory process of providing consents prior to conception.
5.63	Consultation Question 66 19.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway. Do consultees agree? 19.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.	19.87 SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.88 SurrogacyUK already undertakes the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic and so thinks there is no reason not to require them for the new pathway.
5.64	Consultation Question 67 19.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway: (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of	19.89(1) SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.89(2) SurrogacyUK agrees, subject to counsellors also meeting the requirements set out in the HFEA Code of Practice at paragraphs 14.7 to 14.14. entering into that arrangement; and (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15. Do consultees agree?

5.65	Consultation Question 68 19.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed. Do consultees agree?	19.90 SurrogacyUK does not agree. See Section 4.5 for more information on our position.
5.66	Consultation Question 69 19.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway: (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates; (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate. Do consultees agree? 19.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.	19.91 SurrogacyUK agrees. 19.92 SurrogacyUK agrees to the list, subject to it being non-exhaustive.
5.67	Consultation Question 70 19.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.	19.93 SurrogacyUK does not think there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the New Pathway. Our organisation has a number of child-free surrogates and we see no difference in outcomes between surrogates with and without children.

Section	Question	Response
5.68	Consultation Question 71 19.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway. Do consultees agree?	19.94 SurrogacyUK agrees that this should not be a statutory requirement, but instead the surrogate's obstetric history should be considered as a factor in screening before conception in the New Pathway. This would identify any surrogates with increased risks who might benefit from obstetric counselling before deciding whether to proceed with an arrangement.
5.69	Consultation Question 72 19.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be: (1) based on an allowance; (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.	19.95 See Section 4.3 for SurrogacyUK's views on the method of reimbursing a surrogate's costs.
5.70	Consultation Question 73 19.96 We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".	19.96 SurrogacyUK does not think it's helpful to make a distinction between "essential costs (this question) and "additional costs" (Question 5.71) since what is essential to one person might not be to another. For example, in London the most efficient way for a surrogate to travel to appointments may be by public transport, whilst for a surrogate living in the countryside the only option might be by taxi or a car.
5.71	Consultation Question 74 19.97 We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.	19.97 SurrogacyUK does not think it's helpful to make a distinction between "essential costs (Question 5.70) and "additional costs" (this question) since what is essential to one person might not be to another. For example, in London the most efficient way for a surrogate to travel to appointments may be by public transport, whilst for a surrogate living in the countryside the only option might be by taxi or a car. Instead we think these costs should be in a category called "pregnancy costs".
5.72	Consultation Question 75 19.98 We invite consultees' views as to: (1) whether intended parents should be	19.98 SurrogacyUK thinks that intended parents should be permitted to reimburse actual costs specific to a surrogacy arrangement

We do not think, however, that any expenses related to maintaining contact after the birth should be considered part of the surrogacy arrangement and so should be excluded from this and any other category.
5.73	Consultation Question 76 19.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).	19.99 SurrogacyUK thinks that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings.
5.74	Consultation Question 77 19.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings: (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).	19.100(1) SurrogacyUK thinks this should be permitted where there is reasonable evidence to support the request, for example: past pattern of overtime/commission. 19.100(2) SurrogacyUK thinks this should be permitted where there is concrete evidence that potential earnings have been foregone e.g. a job offer that cannot be accepted because of the surrogacy arrangement.
5.75	Consultation Question 78 19.101 We invite consultees to share their experiences: (1) of the impact that payments received by a surrogate from the intended parents has had on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits; and (2) where a surrogacy arrangement has had an impact on the surrogate's entitlement to means-tested social welfare benefits, how that has been addressed in their surrogacy arrangement.	19.101 See Section 4.3 for SurrogacyUK's views on a surrogate's entitlement to means-tested benefits.
5.76	Consultation Question 79 19.102 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate for the following: (1) pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth; (2) medical treatments relating to the surrogacy, including payments for each insemination or embryo transfer; and/or (3) specified complications, including hyperemesis gravidarum, pre-eclampsia, an	19.102(1)&(3) SurrogacyUK thinks if there is an actual cost associated with the pain and inconvenience arising from the pregnancy and childbirth or from specific medical conditions then the intended parents should pay for this, for example: unpaid leave from work. It may be possible to take out financial protection products (insurance) to cover rare, but possibly costly situations like this and we think that the legal framework should be designed in such a way as to encourage the development of such products. 19.102 (2), 19.103 & 19.104 SurrogacyUK thinks it's not appropriate for a surrogate to receive compensation payments from intended parents for having routine medical treatments associated with the pregnancy or for any unforeseen medical complications which - whilst unfortunate - arise from the act being pregnant. A surrogate has freely and willingly chosen to carry a child for someone else and is not a victim who should receive compensation for 'harm' done to her, which is the usual basis of a PSLA claim.
5.77	Consultation Question 80 19.105 We invite consultees' views as to whether intended parents should be able to pay compensation to the surrogate's family in the event of the pregnancy resulting in the surrogate's death, including through payment of the cost of life assurance for the surrogate.	19.105 SurrogacyUK does not think compensation is legitimate, as stated in our response to Q102-104. We think, however, that financial protection and insurance products such as life insurance and critical illness/disability insurance should be allowed to give the surrogate's family financial stability and to replace lost income or the cost of looking after dependents for a period of time following her death. We think that the legal framework should be designed in such a way as to encourage the development of surrogacy-specific products and that thought should be given as to whether some or all of them should be mandated in the new pathway.

5.78	Consultation Question 81 19.106 We invite consultees' views as to whether: (1) intended parents should be able to buy gifts for the surrogate; and (2) if so, specific provision should be made for these gifts to be modest or reasonable in nature.	19.106 SurrogacyUK does not think it is the role of the state to regulate gifts between individuals and, as in many other relationship situations, it's perfectly normal for surrogates and intended parents to give each other gifts. Gifts should not form part of the surrogacy arrangement, specifically the financial agreement. Gifts in a surrogacy arrangement should be treated by the tax and benefits system, the same way as any other gifts between private individuals i.e. an allowance should be made for a certain value of gifts, however, above which they should be treated as income and should be declared as such by either side.
5.79	Consultation Question 82 19.107 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be possible for the intended parents to agree to pay a woman for the service of undertaking a surrogacy. 19.108 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman for the service of undertaking surrogacy, whether that the fee should be: (1) any sum agreed between the parties to the surrogacy; or (2) a fixed fee set by the regulator. 19.109 We invite consultees' views as to whether, if provision is made for intended parents to pay a woman a fixed fee for the service of undertaking surrogacy, what, if any, other payments the law should permit, in addition to that fixed fee: (1) no other payments; (2) essential costs relating to the pregnancy; (3) additional costs relating to the pregnancy; (4) lost earnings; (5) compensation for pain and inconvenience, medical treatment and complications, and the death of the surrogate; and/or (6) gifts.	19.107, 19.108 & 19.109 SurrogacyUK does not think a surrogate should be allowed to profit from a domestic surrogacy arrangement under any circumstance and so would not support the payment of a fee. See Section 4.3 for more information on our position.
5.82	Consultation Question 87 19.115 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are specific methods of enforcing limitations that are placed on payments to surrogates that we should consider as part of our review: (1) for cases within the new pathway to parenthood; and (2) for cases where a parental order is made after the birth of the baby.	19.115 SurrogacyUK's thoughts on compliance with payment rules are set out in Section 4.3.

In addition, at least one intended parent should receive the same leave as a woman who is carrying their own child would be entitled to take during her own pregnancy. See Appendix 4 for more information on our position.
5.88	Consultation Question 104 19.139 We invite consultees' views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.	19.139 SurrogacyUK thinks the terminology should be changed to include the scenario of a woman inducing lactation, who is not a pregnant woman, and a surrogate expressing milk, who is not a nursing mother, following their return to work. See Appendix 4 for more information on our position.
5.89	Consultation Question 105 19.140 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.	19.140 SurrogacyUK thinks that the Department of Employment should develop guidance for employers as to how surrogacy in the UK operates; what the statutory employment implications of this are; and, to highlight good practice regarding discretionary benefits offered to employees.

5.90	Consultation Question 106 19.141 We invite consultees' views as to whether they believe any reforms in relation to surrogacy and succession law are required.	19.141 SurrogacyUK agrees that the issue highlighted by the Law Commission with regard to the descent of titles is one that is bound up with a wider discussion on donor conception. While we look forward to the government bringing forward legislation that provides for the descent of titles to donor conceived children, we recognise that this is beyond the scope of this consultation. We note that the same issue is also pertinent to the succession to the Crown. Indeed this matter was raised during debate in the House of Lords of the Succession to the Crown Bill (now Act 2014). We look forward to the Government taking steps to also address this matter.
5.91	Consultation Question 107 19.142 We invite consultees' views as to whether there are any issues in how surrogacy arrangements are dealt with by the health services, and whether there are reforms to law or practice that consultees would like to see in this area. 19.143 We invite consultees' views as to any additions or revisions that they would like to see made to the guidance published by the Department for Health and Social Care for England and Wales. 19.144 We invite consultees' views as to how midwifery practice may better accommodate surrogacy arrangements, in particular with regard to safeguarding issues.	19.142 SurrogacyUK thinks that there is a need for significant improvement to standardise the policies and the approach taken by all hospitals that may at some point deal with surrogacy. 19.143 SurrogacyUK thinks that there should be more explicit guidance around birth. For example, in theatre settings where elective surgery is to take place there should always be room to have intended parents present alongside the surrogate and birth partner (if the surrogate so wishes). Small steps such as these will help eliminate friction points that are easily surmountable. In healthcare, there is a wealth of 'mandatory' training that takes place with varying levels of importance. Surrogacy, especially for those professionals who deal with the birth, would benefit from having an interesting, engaging elearning package that would improve the understanding of all aspects of surrogacy. This could be something enforced by the Department of Health and Social Care.

		19.144 SurrogacyUK thinks that a mid-pregnancy meeting with a senior midwife to discuss care plans should be made standard across all surrogacy arrangements.
5.92	Consultation Question 114 19.152 We invite consultees who consider that they might be able to fulfil the role of the independent professional discussed in Chapter 9 to tell us: (1) their profession; and (2) what they would charge to provide such a service.	19.152 SurrogacyUK thinks Regulated Surrogacy Organisations are best placed to undertake the activities that would be performed by the independent professional because such organisations will already be performing such activities under the supervision of the regulator. There is no reason why parties to a surrogacy arrangement who have met independently couldn't then use a regulated organisation to meet the screening, agreement and consent requirements of the new pathway. Indeed, this is something that SurrogacyUK already supports today: we welcome people who have met independently, but subsequently come to us for our screening checks, surrogacy agreement facilitation or ongoing support. Given the probable client volume of regulated surrogacy organisations, this is likely to be a cost effective way of delivering this service. Independent professionals wanting to offer such surrogacy-related services should become Regulated Surrogacy Organisations in order to do so. There should be no requirement for an independent professional (or indeed a surrogacy organisation) to operate as a full-service Regulated Surrogacy Organisation, they could choose the services they wish to deliver and be regulated accordingly. See Section 4.4 for more information on our position.

5.93	Consultation Question 118 19.157 We invite consultees' views as to any other impact that we have not specifically addressed in this chapter, or the preceding chapters, of this paper.	19.157 SurrogacyUK thinks that the proposals should specifically seek to minimise the potential for the UK to become a location for international surrogacy. There needs to be an holistic approach to this, which we think should include careful consideration of the eligibility criteria for domestic surrogacy arrangements, and not allowing enforceable contracts between surrogates and intended parents or organisations, and ensuring surrogates and organisations do not profit from domestic surrogacy arrangements.

6. APPENDICES

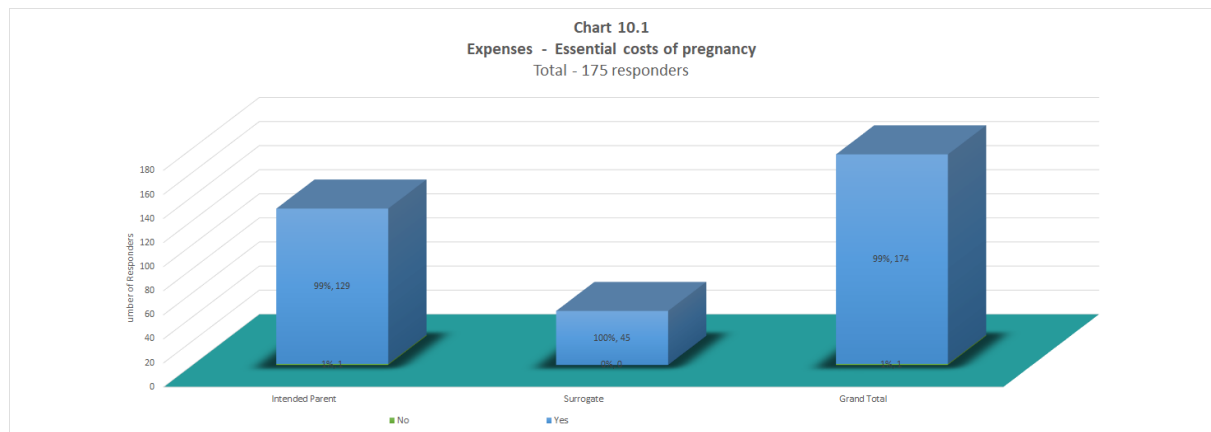

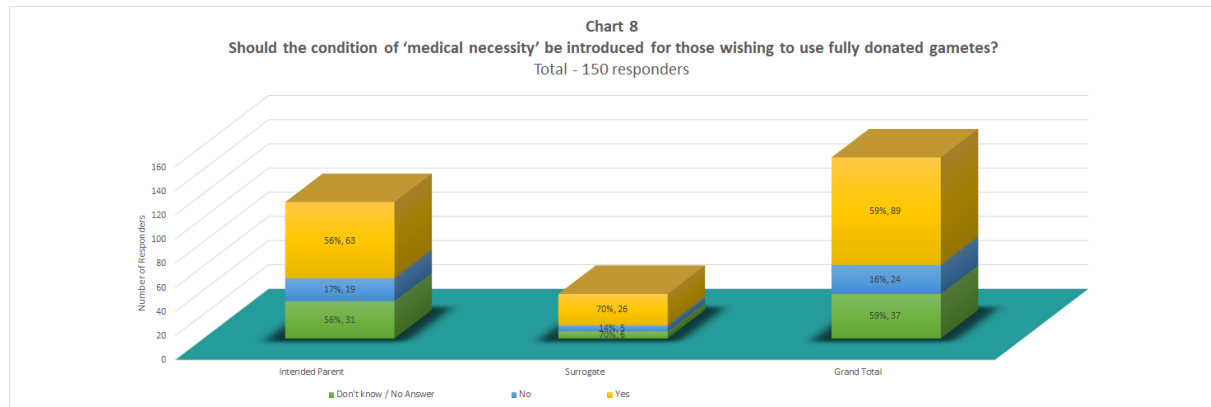

This section contains the data commissioned by SurrogacyUK to support our analysis of the Law Commissions' proposals.

Appendix 1: SurrogacyUK 2019 Survey

We asked people with lived experience of surrogacy for their opinions on the Law Commissions' most significant proposals. This was executed as an online survey, which was publicised on public social media as well as promoted to SurrogacyUK members by email. Responders were asked to state if they were a surrogate or intended parent. We received 72 responses from surrogates and 175 responses from intended parents.

Appendix 3: SurrogacyUK Surrogate Estimated Expenses

SurrogacyUK asks our surrogates to create an estimate of what their costs are likely to be before they become “active” (i.e. look for intended parents). This process encourages them to think about their own life situation, what will be affected, and what needs they will have in a surrogacy arrangement. We provide a simple tool that helps them model their costs, hence the rounding of numbers. A surrogate’s actual costs will obviously vary from the estimate as the intended parents’ requests (e.g. clinic location) and the reality of the surrogacy arrangement unfolds. We think it’s nevertheless a good proxy for the range and amounts reimbursed to our surrogates. Note: we have recorded this data since 2017 and these are the amounts entered at the time of becoming active, so they haven’t been adjusted for inflation.

Appendix 4: Employment Issues in Surrogacy

We surveyed SurrogacyUK surrogates and SurrogacyUK and intended parents from both SurrogacyUK and elsewhere about employment issues to support our response to the questions asked by the Law Commissions on this matter. We received 40 responses from surrogates and 110 responses from intended parents. Our responses to the questions asked by the Law Commissions can be found in Sections 5.85 to 5.89 of this document.

SECTION 5.85 / Question 10: We invite consultees views as to whether the current application of the law on statutory paternity leave and statutory paternity pay, to the situation of the surrogate's spouse, civil partner or partner requires reform.

As the consultation document indicates at 7.12 due to the additional criteria that apply to paternity leave to care for the child, surrogate's partners are not usually granted paternity leave nor does SurrogacyUK recommend they attempt to apply for this. The cost of surrogate partners taking unpaid time off work is usually covered as part of a surrogate's expenses.

Surrogate's experiences were mixed in terms of the ability to take time off, the majority had found that employers did offer some flexibility for their partners to take unpaid leave however some found that it was difficult for this to be arranged. In particular this has been an issue where the surrogate partner works in an industry with fixed periods for leave such as teachers and shift workers.

All surrogates think should be a provision for leave for surrogate's partners. There was a division between whether this should be paid or unpaid. Many surrogates felt that unpaid leave would be acceptable with the proviso that loss of earnings for partners can be covered by the expenses a surrogate can claim.

The majority would expect their partner to take time off after the birth to support them and include this in existing expenses. Surrogates feel that having this support is essential to support their recovery post birth, and in many cases to provide care to their own children, ensuring they are not adversely affected by the surrogacy experience.

In practice there are mixed responses from employers regarding flexibility to allow time off from work and the notice required as this is a grey area and not covered by the current paternity leave requirements.

Surrogates feel strongly that the terminology of 'paternity' leave and pay is not appropriate to a surrogacy situation and the leave should be called surrogate partner leave or another similar name. It has been indicated that it could be seen as taking something away from the parent through surrogacy by a surrogate's partner being able to take this type of leave.

In terms of the timescales, most surrogates indicated that up to two weeks would usually be sufficient however in the case of a caesarean section or complicated birth longer may be required.

Under the new pathway should the proposed requirements of counselling and STI screening before conception be made mandatory for surrogates' partners these appointments would increase the amount of time of work required by a surrogate's partner. At present there is no requirement for a surrogate's partner to attend these appointments in a traditional (straight) surrogacy arrangement and in the case of gestational (host) surrogacy individual clinics have differing practices in relation to the requirement (or not) for a surrogate's partner to be STI screened or attend counselling. Should the new pathway require partner attendance at such appointments it is recommended that an allowance for surrogate partners to be able to take leave to cover these appointments be included in the legislation.

Evidence from Surrogacy UK surrogates:

My husband's employer has been supportive in that they have allowed for him to take time off (unpaid) for scans and he can take unpaid leave after the baby is born to help me with our kids. I think they should definitely be entitled to some kind of paid leave

I think a week would be a good compromise- my hubby has never come to a scan unless it fell when he was already on a day off or I needed him there, his employers have always allowed him to do short notice unpaid leave.

My husband has taken around a week off after the birth as unpaid leave and this has always been fine where he works. Even though it's a small team and it means him ringing in the day I've gone into labour or the day after to say I've had the baby so he's taking his week now, they've always been great and let him do this.

I don't think paternity leave for surrogacy should be picked up by taxpayers but it should be included in expenses

It would be helpful to have been able to take some unpaid leave. But always difficult when you are self employed and you have to take the work when it's available.

My partner wasn't able to take leave after the birth as he works shifts so was unable to get time off, I would have liked to have his support.

I don't think it's right to bill it as 'paternity leave', but an entitlement for surrogate partners to have some unpaid leave to support their partners during and following birth (with costs to be met by IPs) seems reasonable. Not sure if it's a week or longer, maybe longer in case of c section etc?

I think language is very important - it should be paternity leave but surrogate partner entitlement

Paternity leave doesn't feel right. Feels like it's taking something away from the paternal parents right to leave, semantically.

Section 5.86 / Question 102: We provisionally propose that for provision for maternity allowance should be made in respect of intended parents, and that any such provision should be limited so that only one intended parent qualifies. Do consultees agree?

SurrogacyUK welcomes this proposal and is in agreement that the current situation is inconsistent with the rights of other parents expecting a child.

A survey by SurrogacyUK of 110 intended parents indicated that 28% were self employed, this is significantly higher than UK averages of 15% across 2018 and 15.1% of total employment in the three months to June 2019, ONS.

Intended parents are often financially disadvantaged by surrogacy being their only route to parenthood and therefore to suffer a further disadvantage due to employment status is inherently unfair.

Anecdotal evidence indicates that some intended parents have actively chosen self-employment over employment following unsupportive practices and inflexibility during their own IVF treatment or surrogacy journey.

As self employed people are unable to claim statutory adoption pay, parents through surrogacy are treated differently due to employment rights being aligned to adoption leave.

We agree that limiting this to allow one parent through surrogacy would be consistent with parents through other means of family building.

The terminology and language will need to be considered here as a same sex male (or non binary) couple may not be comfortable with the language of 'maternity allowance' and therefore suggest a revised definition such as 'parenting allowance' or 'surrogacy allowance' as an alternative which offers provision of an allowance which financially mirrors that of the current maternity allowance, allowing self-employed parents through surrogacy as well as those who have recently changed jobs (and would not qualify for statutory adoption pay) to claim.

Section 5.87 / Question 103: We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) Where there is a need for reform in respect of the right of intended parents to take time off work before the birth of the child, whether for the purpose of induced lactation, antenatal appointment of any other reason; and
- (2) If reform is needed suggestions on reform.

Consideration should be given to allow additional paid or unpaid time off for appointments during a surrogacy journey. The standard provision of up to two antenatal appointments up to 6.5 hours is unlikely to cover the requirements of a surrogacy pregnancy due to the reasons outlined above and leave should be allowed for at least one of the intended parents to ensure that they are treated consistently with what they would be entitled to where they are able to carry themselves.

Section 5.87(1) / Question 103(1)

Evidence from Surrogacy UK indicates that this is a key issue faced by intended parents, particularly in relation to the timing of when surrogacy leave can start. As the law stipulates that the leave can only commence from the day of birth intended parents have been concerned that they may miss the birth or be unprepared for their child's arrival due to not being able to commence their leave.

It is common in surrogacy relationships that there may be a distance between the surrogate and intended parents with IPs often moving close to the surrogate in order to be present for the birth. Being at the birth is a key opportunity for parents through surrogacy to bond with their child and very important to the majority of surrogates. If intended parents work in roles where they are restricted in terms of taking holidays such as shift workers or teachers they risk missing the birth as they are unable to start their leave until their surrogate goes into labour.

In gestational (host) surrogacy arrangements it is common that a surrogate will have additional scans to check growth and appointments due to IVF and being under consultant-led care. The standard entitlement of two appointments will mean that unless the intended parents' employers offer additional flexibility or they are able to use holiday intended parents will miss key appointments.

The 'booking in' appointment with the midwife will require information from all involved in order to assess potential complications and gather information about the family the surrogate is carrying the baby for. Growth scans can be as often as every 2 - 3 weeks in the 2nd and 3rd trimester, an opportunity for intended parents to bond with their future child and be fully informed regarding development.

Treating both intended parents in the same way that legislation treats a pregnant person's partner creates an inequality in comparison with a situation where one of the parents were able to carry themselves. Decisions may need to be made and information provided regarding the development of the intended parents future child.

In addition to appointments an attendance at birth intended parents may wish to take time prior to the birth to establish a breastmilk supply. Inducing lactation requires very frequent expression and whilst there are steps employers can take to support intended parents whilst at work there may be cases where intended parents wish to start leave earlier in order to allow for this.

Section 5.87(2) / Question 103(2)

Aligning the provision of the ability to start leave with that of adoption in order to prepare for their child (two weeks prior to placement / birth) would seem appropriate.

Consideration should be given to allow additional paid or unpaid time off for appointments during a surrogacy journey. The standard provision of up to two antenatal appointments up to 6.5 hours is unlikely to cover the requirements of a surrogacy pregnancy due to the reasons outlined above and leave should be allowed for at least one of the intended parents to ensure that they are treated consistently with what they would be entitled to where they able to carry themselves.

Section 5.88 / Question 104: We invite consultee's views as to whether the duty of employers to provide suitable facilities for any person at work who is a pregnant woman or nursing mother to rest under Regulation 25 of the Workplace (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1992 is sufficient to include intended parents in a surrogacy arrangement.

The terminology in the existing legislation is unhelpful as this would not cover a woman inducing lactation (who is not a pregnant woman) or a surrogate expressing milk (who is not a nursing mother) following their return to work.

Reform to this legislation to cover the above situations would be welcomed. Many intended mothers will induce lactation and a number of surrogates provide breast milk to children they have given birth to via surrogacy on an ongoing basis. The expectation of a supportive employer may assist intended parents remaining at work until a later date or a surrogate returning to work at an earlier point and therefore it is in the interests of both employers and employees to take a supportive approach to providing facilities and rest to those expressing breastmilk.

Flexibility in this area provides an opportunity for babies born through surrogacy to receive breastmilk and benefit from the health advantages that breastmilk can provide.

Section 5.89 / Question 105: We invite consultees' views as to whether there are further issues in relation to employment rights and surrogacy arrangements and, if so, any suggestions for reform.

Awareness

The main issue encountered by both surrogates and intended parents is a lack of awareness of employers about surrogacy and how this operates with the UK. Organisations such as ACAS, CIPD, employers associations such as NHS employers, UCEA, LGA and trade unions could help ensure that employers, employees and HR professionals are aware of surrogacy and the employment rights of intended parents and surrogates. At present it is unusual for employers to have a policy in place that covers surrogacy as a form of family creation and as a result intended parents are often unclear of what support they will receive from employers in terms of leave and pay. Whilst it may not be feasible to insist all employers have a surrogacy policy, clear guidance should be available for employers and employees.

Notification and Documentation

Notification of pregnancy is an issue that has arisen for a number of intended parents. Surrogacy UK is aware of employers in several cases refusing to accept a copy of the surrogate's MATB1 and asking for a witnessed statutory declaration that the intended parents will apply for a parental order. This is a further additional cost to intended parents.

A common misconception documented in surrogacy policies is that the parental order must be granted within six months of birth (or start of leave) rather than the requirement that it is applied for within six months of the birth. SurrogacyUK is aware of cases where intended parents have been told that unless the employer receives evidence that a parental order has been granted within the six months they will be required to repay adoption pay.

Whilst the ACAS guidance is consistent with the law;

Parental orders to become the legal parent(s) of the child can be sought 6 weeks after the child is born, and before they are 6 months old.

Policies for surrogacy leave regularly misinterpret the guidance. Examples include:

University of [REDACTED]: Where the baby is the subject of a Parental Order following a legal surrogacy arrangement, the University will provide surrogate parents with the equivalent entitlements as those which apply to adoptive parents. The University requires:

- A copy of the MATB1 prior to the birth of the baby, and
- A copy of the parental order no later than 6 months after the commencement of adoptive leave

Imperial College: *Where, as an alternative to adoption, the baby is the subject of a Parental Order following a legal surrogacy arrangement, in addition to a copy of the MATB1 certificate issued to the surrogate, you must also provide the College with a copy of the 'Parental Order' within 6 months of the baby's birth. The College retains the right to reclaim any payment made, and to be compensated for leave taken, if the member of staff fails to provide a copy of the 'Parental Order' within 6 months of Leave and Pay commencing.

Source: https://www.imperial.ac.uk/media/imperial-college/administration-and-support-services/hr/public/procedures/family/familyfriendly-08/Adoption_Surrogacy-Policy.pdf

It is a source of concern to intended parents that they may need to repay adoption pay received if their parental order is not granted within the six month timescale.

SurrogacyUK recommends that that clear guidance is provided regarding the evidence intended parents must provide to employers under the new pathway to avoid any concerns that pay could be reclaimed by an employer. This could be submission of the birth certificate following the birth registration and opportunity for the surrogate to object. For cases which remain under the parental order route guidance should be clear that the intention to apply for a parental order should be sufficient rather than proof that the parental order is granted.

Consultation Question 1.

1.1 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in England and Wales:

- (1) all international surrogacy arrangements should continue to be automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court; and

YES

International surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale, abuse and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should continue to be heard by a judge of the High Court. Ideally, all international surrogacy agreements should be ended due to these risks.

- (2) if international surrogacy arrangements are not automatically allocated to a judge of the High Court, circuit judges should be ticketed to hear such cases.

Paragraph 6.42

Consultation Question 2.

1.2 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in respect of England and Wales

- (1) domestic surrogacy cases which continue to require a post-birth parental order should continue to be heard by lay justices, or whether they should be allocated to another level of the judiciary; and

- (2) If consultees consider that such cases should be allocated to another level of the judiciary, which level of the judiciary would be appropriate.

All surrogacy arrangements pose opportunities for the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of birth mothers. These are human rights issues of the utmost seriousness and so the arrangements should be overseen by a senior and experienced judge. For this reason these cases should NOT be heard by a lay judge but rather by a senior judge, e.g. ticketed to circuit judges or higher. Due to the inevitable effects of poverty and economic coercion among countries where it is legal these risks are heightened, in addition to the risk for domestic abuse.

Paragraph 6.51

Consultation Question 3.

- 1.3 We invite consultees to provide any evidence that would support either the retention of the current allocation rules, or their reform along the lines that we discuss in Consultation Questions 1 and 2.

Paragraph 6.53

Consultation Question 4.

- 1.4 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, the court should be placed under a duty to consider whether to make an order awarding the intended parents parental responsibility at the first directions hearing in the proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

(Note that this provisional proposal would be necessary only if our provisional proposal in Chapter 8 that all intended parents (whether in the new pathway or not) automatically acquire parental responsibility if the child is living with or being cared for by them is not supported by consultees).

NO

The UN Special Rapporteur recommends* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. Nothing about the transfer of parental responsibility should be automatic and all options should be open.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Consultation Question 5.

- 1.5 We provisionally propose that the rule currently contained in rule 16.35(5) of the FPR 2010 should be reversed, so that a parental order report is released to the parties in the proceedings by default, unless the court directs otherwise.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 6.72

Consultation Question 6.

- 1.6 We invite consultees' views as to whether they are of the view that, in Scotland:
- (1) there is a need for greater consistency and clarity in provisions relating to the expenses of curators ad litem and reporting officers and, if so, how this should be addressed;
 - (2) it should be provided by statute that, at the initial hearing or any subsequent hearing for a parental order, the court may make any such interim order or orders for parental responsibilities and parental rights as it sees fit; and/or
 - (3) further procedural reform is needed and, if so, what that reform should be.

Paragraph 6.110

Consultation Question 7.

- 1.7 In respect of a domestic surrogacy arrangement, we provisionally propose that, before the child is conceived, where the intended parents and surrogate have:
- (1) entered into an agreement including the prescribed information, which will include a statement as to legal parenthood on birth,
 - (2) complied with procedural safeguards for the agreement, and
 - (3) met eligibility requirements,

on the birth of the child the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child, subject to the surrogate's right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I vehemently disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's key recommendations* and the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Intercountry Adoption of 1993. These require the birth mother to have legal parenthood and parental responsibility when the child is born and that her consent to giving up the child must be freely given AFTER the child's birth. I believe that this important safeguard against the sale of children and the exploitation of birth mothers should apply equally to surrogacy arrangements, in both an international and a domestic context. This is akin to the sale of the child.

This proposal would set a very dangerous precedent for all women, all mothers, all children and all of the implications need to be fully understood. There is no evidence in the consultation paper that the law commissioners have considered these more general implications fully, if at all.

I understand that the proposal to automatically grant the 'intended parents' legal parenthood at birth is based on (or justified by) in part at least the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. I do not agree that these claimed wishes alone justify measures that contravene the recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and to protect birth mothers.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to encourage or condone a system that would require women to deliberately conceive and subsequently give birth with the expectation that they would have little or no legal responsibility for the child. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some 'surrogate' mothers say they want or not.

Paragraph 8.13

Consultation Question 8.

- 1.8 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations and licensed clinics should be under a duty to keep a record of surrogacy arrangements under the new pathway to which they are a party, with such records being retained for a specified minimum period.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations.

No records should be kept because this should not be legal. Women's bodies should not be for rent, either domestically or internationally.

- 1.9 We invite consultees' views as to what the length of that period should be: whether 100 years or another period.

Paragraph 8.14

Consultation Question 9.

- 1.10 We provisionally propose that the prohibition on the use of anonymously donated gametes should apply to traditional surrogacy arrangements with which a regulated surrogacy organisation is involved.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations, because they would inevitably lead to a normalising of surrogacy and an increase in its prevalence.

Paragraph 8.21

Consultation Question 10.

- 1.11 We invite consultees' views as to whether the use of anonymously donated sperm in a traditional, domestic surrogacy arrangement should prevent that arrangement from entering into the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway.'

Paragraph 8.22

Consultation Question 11.

- 1.12 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the surrogate should have the right to object to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents, for a fixed period after the birth of the child;

- (2) this right to object should operate by the surrogate making her objection in writing within a defined period, with the objection being sent to both the intended parents and the body responsible for the regulation of surrogacy; and
- (3) the defined period should be the applicable period for birth registration less one week.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposal that the 'intended parents' should automatically acquire legal parenthood at birth and that the birth mother has only a limited time to object. This contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations,* including that the birth mother is the legal parent at birth and that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements are taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth, with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration.

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. In a normal delivery there might have been significant blood loss leading to anaemia. After a Caesarean, to these changes is added all the stress of recovering from major abdominal surgery. It is totally inappropriate to expect the birth mother to make a calm and considered decision of such huge and life-changing significance at such a time – not to mention following through with the practical requirements of putting it in writing and ensuring it is received before the expiry of the deadline.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.35

Consultation Question 12.

1.13 We provisionally propose that, where the surrogate objects to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood within the period fixed after birth, the surrogacy arrangement should no longer be able to proceed in the new pathway, with the result that:

- (1) the surrogate will be the legal parent of the child;
- (2) if one of the intended parents would, under the current law, be a legal parent of the child, then he or she will continue to be a legal parent in these circumstances; and
- (3) the intended parents would be able to make an application for a parental order to obtain legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly with the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

The birth registration period is only 6 weeks and is shorter in Scotland – so the proposal is to give the birth mother less than 5 weeks to object. The 6 weeks after childbirth are recognised as the most rapid period of physical, physiological and emotional change that takes place in healthy human life. * <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.36

Consultation Question 13.

1.14 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should be required to make a declaration on registering the birth of the child that they have no reason to believe that the surrogate has lacked capacity at any time during the period in which she had the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood;
- (2) if the intended parents cannot provide this declaration then, during the period in which she has the right to object to the intended parents acquiring legal parenthood, the surrogate should be able to provide a positive consent to such acquisition; and
- (3) if the intended parents are unable to make this declaration and the surrogate is unable to provide the positive consent within the relevant period, the surrogacy arrangement should exit the new pathway and the intended parents should be able to make an application for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects.

The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth, along with her husband, spouse or civil partner if she has one – and decisions about any subsequent change of legal parenthood and parental responsibility must be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and with the child's best interest being the paramount consideration, in accordance with the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendations.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.37

Consultation Question 14.

1.15 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, the welfare of the child to be born as a result of the surrogacy arrangement:

- (1) should be assessed in the way set out in Chapter 8 of the current Code of Practice;
- (2) either the regulated surrogacy organisation or regulated clinic, as appropriate, should be responsible for ensuring that this procedure is followed; and
- (3) there should be no requirement for any welfare assessment of the child after his or her birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. It contradicts the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth and that the child's best interests are the paramount consideration. A welfare assessment is an absolute requirement if an informed decision is to be made about the child's best interest. Therefore a welfare assessment MUST be made after the child's birth.

The pre-conception assessment would typically have been carried out more than a year before the birth of the child. Much can change in that time.

The justification that a welfare assessment after the birth of the child is not necessary because parents of children born through the normal process are not subject to such checks does not hold. Pregnancy, birth and the post-partum changes are intense physical and existential experiences that change you and prime you to love and be sensitive to the new-born child and rise to the challenge of the enormous task of raising him or her to adulthood. For obvious reasons 'intended parents' do not have this advantage.

In addition, pregnancy and childbirth are a huge investment of the birth mother's physical, physiological and emotional resources, which means she has already made a huge and unquantifiable, nearly year-long, commitment to the child. This means her practical and emotional commitment to the child is already well-developed, giving her the best chance of surmounting all the difficulties that will inevitably arise over the course of the child's childhood and adolescence.

The 'intended parents' have had no similar experience. The investment of financial resources does not in any way prepare you for the practical reality of caring for a new-born child and the long road of nurturing and shepherding him or her to adulthood.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.51

Consultation Question 15.

1.16 We provisionally propose that, for a child born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement under the new pathway, where the surrogate has exercised her right to object to the intended parents' acquisition of legal parenthood at birth, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner, if any, should not be a legal parent of the child.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'new pathway.'

There is a very real risk that spouses and partners will coerce women into being a 'surrogate' for financial gain. This risk is likely to increase if he or she does not have legal parenthood or parental responsibility for any children born of the arrangement. This is enough reason to reject this proposal.

However, it also represents a significant change in legal parenthood rules and would therefore have an implication for all children, all families because it would set a precedent. It should not be introduced without a full assessment of all the implications, including on the rights of mothers and children. There is no evidence that the law commissioners have carried out any such assessment.

1.17 We invite consultees' views as to whether, in the case of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the surrogate's spouse or civil partner should continue to be a legal parent of the child born as a result of the arrangement.

YES

The normal legal parenthood rules should apply. This will reduce the risk of spouses and partners coercing women into surrogacy for financial gain.

Paragraph 8.57

Consultation Question 16.

1.18 We provisionally propose that, in the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn:

- (1) the intended parents should be the legal parents of the child unless the surrogate exercises her right to object; and
- (2) the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period of the right to object.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' – particularly the 'intended parents' acquiring legal parenthood automatically at birth unless the birth mother objects. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn.

1.19 We provisionally propose that, outside the new pathway, where a child born of a surrogacy arrangement is stillborn, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the stillbirth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the birth parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and this should not change if the child is stillborn and the registration should accurately reflect this.

Paragraph 8.77

Consultation Question 17.

1.20 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where the child dies before the making of the parental order, the surrogate should be able to consent to the intended parents being registered as the parents before the expiry of the period allowed for the registration of the birth, provided that the intended parents have made a declaration to the effect that the relevant criteria for the making of a parental order are satisfied, on registration of the birth.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and if the child dies before the parental order, the registration of birth should accurately reflect that the birth mother was the legal parent.

Paragraph 8.79

Consultation Question 18.

1.21 For surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether, where the surrogate dies in childbirth or before the end of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, the arrangement should not proceed in the new pathway and the intended parents should be required to make an application for a parental order.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. This "pathway" presents a profound opportunity for the exploitation, dehumanisation and abuse of women and will particularly affect the most vulnerable in society such as the economically disadvantaged. It makes way for multiple human rights abuses to increase and become normalised and incentivised in addition to providing an increased incentive for human trafficking/ slavery. 40.3 million people are currently enslaved around the world and I have serious concerns that this will exacerbate the problem.

Paragraph 8.80

Consultation Question 19.

- 1.22 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy, the intended parents should be registered as the child's parents on birth, subject to the surrogate not exercising her right to object within the defined period.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with the deceased 'intended parents' being registered as the legal parents in this situation. The birth mother should always be the legal parent of the child at birth and the registration of birth should accurately reflect this. Any changes should be determined by a combination of the birth mothers wishes and what is deemed to be in the child's best interests.

- 1.23 We invite consultees' views as to whether, for surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, where both intended parents die during the surrogate's pregnancy or before a parental order is made:
- (1) it should be competent for an application to be made, by a person who claims an interest under section 11(3)(a) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, or who would be permitted to apply for an order under section 8 of the Children Act 1989:
 - (a) for an order for appointment as guardian of the child, and
 - (b) for a parental order in the name of the intended parents, subject to the surrogate's consent; or
 - (2) the surrogate should be registered as the child's mother and it should not be possible for the intended parents to be registered as the child's parents, but that there should be a procedure for the surrogate to provide details of the intended parents, and, if relevant, gamete donors, for entry onto the register of surrogacy arrangements.

The intended parents should NOT be registered as the child's parents if they are already deceased – so option (2) is preferable.

Paragraph 8.81

Consultation Question 20.

- 1.24 We provisionally propose that, where an application is made for a parental order by a sole applicant under section 54A:

- (1) the applicant should have to make a declaration that it was always intended that there would only be a single applicant for a parental order in respect of the child concerned or to supply the name and contact details of the other intended parent;
- (2) if details of another intended parent are supplied, a provision should be made for notice to be given to the potential second intended parent of the application and an opportunity given to that party to provide notice of opposition within a brief period (of, say, 14 to 21 days); and
- (3) if the second intended parent gives notice of his or her intention to oppose, he or she should be required to make his or her own application within a brief period (say 14 days), otherwise the application of the first intended parent will be determined by the court.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 8.86

Consultation Question 21.

1.25 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) a temporary three-parent model of legal parenthood in surrogacy cases; and
- (2) how the legal parenthood of the surrogate should be extinguished in this model.

I profoundly oppose a three-parent model of legal parenthood, even if it is temporary. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child with the best interests of the child being the paramount consideration, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.91

Consultation Question 22.

1.26 We invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether there should be any additional oversight in the new pathway that we have proposed, leading to the acquisition of legal parenthood by the intended parents at birth; and
- (2) if so, as to whether should this oversight be:

- (a) administrative, or
- (b) judicial.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should be the legal parent and have parental responsibility at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child based on the best interests of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur.*

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.93

Consultation Question 23.

1.27 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether the welfare checklist, contained in section 1(3) of the Children Act 1989, should be amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering the arrangements for a child in the context of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement; and
- (2) if so, as to what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions about the child in the event of a dispute about a surrogacy arrangement. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and conforms to the UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

In this, the birth mother should remain the legal mother and this should only change in cases where there is evidence that the child is at serious risk of harm which would also warrant removal of a genetic child in the absence of any surrogacy agreement. Children should not be for sale.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.120

Consultation Question 24.

1.28 In respect of England and Wales, we invite consultees' views:

- (1) as to whether the checklist, contained in section 1(4) of the ACA 2002 (as applied and modified by regulation 2 and paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 of the 2018 Regulations) should be further amended to provide for the court to have regard to additional specific factors in the situation where it is considering whether to make a parental order; and

- (2) what those additional factors should be.

The child's best interests should drive all decisions when considering whether to make a parental order. The welfare checklist provides a comprehensive summary of the issues to be considered and is adequate as it is, and it conforms to UN Special Rapporteur's recommendation* that the child's best interest is the paramount consideration. I therefore do not believe any other factors should be added.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.121

Consultation Question 25.

- 1.29 We invite consultees' view as to whether section 10 of the Children Act 1989 should be amended to add the intended parents to the category of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

NO

There are real risks of the sale and trafficking of children and of exploitation of the birth mother and her reproductive capacities in all surrogacy arrangements. The court should therefore always have oversight of the arrangements. I am also concerned that there should be no liberalisation of the law on surrogacy because of the potential human rights abuses involved. I do not believe that 'intended parents' should be added to the list of those who can apply for a section 8 order without leave.

Paragraph 8.123

Consultation Question 26.

- 1.30 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement outside the new pathway, the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility automatically where:

- (1) the child is living with them or being cared for by them; and
(2) they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with this proposal. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, as recommended by the UN Special Rapporteur* in order to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. Their wishes alone do not justify measures that contravene recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur and the provisions of the Hague Convention that are designed to reduce the risk of the sale and trafficking of children.

Bringing a child into the world is a great responsibility and it is not ethical to condone a system that would require women to give birth with the expectation that they would have no legal responsibility for that child – other than a temporary right to 'object'. The rights of the child must be prioritised regardless whether that is what some birth mothers say they wish.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.132

Consultation Question 27.

1.31 We provisionally propose that, where a child is born as a result of a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway:

- (1) the intended parents should acquire parental responsibility on the birth of the child; and
- (2) if the surrogate exercises her right to object, the intended parents should continue to have parental responsibility for the child where the child is living with, or being cared for by, them, and they intend to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should acquire parentage or parental responsibility automatically. The birth mother should be the legal parent at birth and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

I understand that the decision to automatically grant the 'intended parents' parental responsibility is based on (or justified by) the wishes expressed by some 'surrogate' mothers prior to the consultation. * <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.134

Consultation Question 28.

1.32 We provisionally propose that, for surrogacy arrangements within the new pathway, the surrogate should retain parental responsibility for the child born as a result of the arrangement until the expiry of the period during which she can exercise her right to object, assuming that she does not exercise her right to object.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I agree that the birth mother should have parental responsibility for the child but NOT that the 'intended parents' should get automatic legal parenthood and parental responsibility.

All decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility in surrogacy arrangements should be taken by a court or other competent authority AFTER the birth of the child, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their women's reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.139

Consultation Question 29.

1.33 For all surrogacy arrangements, we invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether there is a need for any restriction to be placed on the exercise of parental responsibility by either the surrogate (or other legal parent), or the intended parents, during the period in which parental responsibility is shared; and
- (2) whether it should operate to restrict the exercise of parental responsibility by the party not caring for the child or with whom the child is not living.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The birth mother should have legal parenthood and parental responsibility at and after the birth and all subsequent decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 8.140

Consultation Question 30.

1.34 We provisionally propose that traditional surrogacy arrangements should fall within the scope of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 9.29

Consultation Question 31.

1.35 We invite the views of independent surrogates, and intended parents who have used independent surrogacy arrangements, to tell us about their experience. In particular, we would be interested to hear about any health screening, counselling and legal advice that took place.

N/A

Paragraph 9.35

Consultation Question 32.

1.36 We invite consultees' views as to whether independent surrogacy arrangements should be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

1.37 We invite consultees' views as to how independent surrogacy arrangements might be brought within the scope of the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. It is inappropriate and contradicts binding obligations under the UNCRC and its first optional protocol.

Paragraph 9.36

Consultation Question 33.

1.38 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) there should be regulated surrogacy organisations;

NO

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- (2) there should be no requirement for a regulated surrogacy organisation to take a particular form; and

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Inevitably their best interests would be cast aside in the name of profit and cost reduction. This is absolutely unacceptable.

There is no human right to have another woman carry your child.

- (3) each surrogacy organisation should be required to appoint an individual responsible for ensuring that the organisation complies with regulation.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.61

Consultation Question 34.

1.39 We provisionally propose that the person responsible must be responsible for:

- (1) representing the organisation to, and liaising with, the regulator;
- (2) managing the regulated surrogacy organisation with sufficient care, competence and skill;
- (3) ensuring the compliance of the organisation with relevant law and regulation, including the creation, maintenance and operation of necessary policies and procedures;
- (4) training any staff, including that of the person responsible; and
- (5) providing data to the regulator and to such other person as required by law.

Do consultees agree?

LEAVE ALL CHECK BOXES BLANK (i.e. none of the above)

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.40 We invite consultees to identify any other responsibilities which a responsible individual should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

1.41 We invite consultees' views as to what experience, skills and qualifications a person responsible for a surrogacy organisation should have.

I disagree with this proposal because regulated surrogacy organisations would sanction and legitimise surrogacy and inevitably lead to an increase in its prevalence. I consider surrogacy to be a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.62

Consultation Question 35.

1.42 We provisionally propose that regulated surrogacy organisations should be non-profit making bodies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy. Even if surrogacy organisations are non-profit making, they will inevitably be driven by commercial imperatives (for example, to cover costs, salaries, etc.) and will need to continuously seek new business and to convince or coerce more women to act as 'surrogates.'

Deriving income from surrogacy is abhorrent and, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution, is a potential violation of Article 6 of CEDAW, which prohibits third-parties profiting or otherwise benefiting from the prostitution of women.

Paragraph 9.84

Consultation Question 36.

1.43 We invite consultees' views as to what should be included in the definition of matching and facilitation services.

I disagree with organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.94

Consultation Question 37.

1.44 We provisionally propose that only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

- 1.45 We invite consultees' views as to whether only regulated surrogacy organisations should be able to offer matching and facilitation services in respect of surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I disagree with regulated surrogacy organisations or any other organisations being able to provide matching and facilitation services for any type of surrogacy, because that would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

Paragraph 9.95

Consultation Question 38.

- 1.46 We invite consultees' views as to the sanctions that should be available against organisations that offer matching and facilitation services without being regulated to do so, and whether these should be criminal, civil or regulatory.

I do not accept that matching and facilitation services should be allowed – regardless who they are provided by – because they would inevitably lead to an increase in surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children. Offering such services should be a criminal offence resulting in a jail sentence. Given the parallels to prostitution this is also particularly concerning and raises similar ethical concerns to those who run brothels.

Paragraph 9.97

Consultation Question 39.

- 1.47 We provisionally propose that the remit of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority be expanded to include the regulation of regulated surrogacy organisations, and oversight of compliance with the proposed legal requirements for the new pathway to legal parenthood.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I disagree with the proposal for regulated surrogacy organisations because they would sanction surrogacy, which I consider a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and would drive an increase in surrogacy.

- 1.48 If consultees agree, we invite their views as to how the Authority's Code of Practice should apply to regulated surrogacy organisations, including which additional or new areas of regulation should be applied.

Paragraph 9.117

Consultation Question 40.

- 1.49 We provisionally propose that surrogacy agreements should remain unenforceable (subject to the exception we provisionally propose in Consultation Question 88 in relation to financial terms).

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 9.129

Consultation Question 41.

- 1.50 We provisionally propose that there should be no prohibition against charging for negotiating, facilitating and advising on surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with this proposal and the opening up of surrogacy in this country, because I consider it a violation of the human rights of both women and the child. The idea of organisations charging to facilitate it is utterly abhorrent and violates the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 6 of CEDAW, given the parallels between surrogacy and prostitution. Article 6 prohibits the exploitation of the prostitution of women – which includes deriving any form of benefit from women's prostitution.

Paragraph 9.135

Consultation Question 42.

- 1.51 We provisionally propose that the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy should be removed, with the effect that there will be no restrictions on advertising anything that can lawfully be done in relation to surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I VEHEMENTLY disagree with removing the current ban on advertising in respect of surrogacy. Surrogacy is a violation of the human rights of both women and children, and enabling advertising sites (and other 'service' organisations) to financially benefit from it is abhorrent.

At this time of increasing poverty and inequality, it would be unethical to promote the idea that being a 'surrogate' mother would be a solution to an impoverished woman's financial problems. If this proposal is implemented, Facebook and Google are likely present surrogacy ads to female students and young women suggesting that becoming a 'surrogate' would provide the solution to their financial worries. The most disadvantaged young women would be the most vulnerable to this idea and it is doubtful it would ever truly be in her best interest.

Just as we protect disadvantaged people from the temptation of selling their kidneys for money, prostituting themselves for money we need to protect disadvantaged women from the temptation of renting their wombs. This means that advertising of surrogacy MUST remain banned.

Paragraph 9.145

Consultation Question 43.

1.52 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, where the making of a parental order in respect of a child born of a surrogacy arrangement has been recorded in the Parental Order Register, the child should be able to access his or her original birth certificate at the age of 18.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.80

Consultation Question 44.

1.53 We provisionally propose that where children are born of surrogacy arrangements that result in the intended parents being recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of that certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. I do not agree that the 'intended parents' should be recorded as parents on the original birth certificate. The birth mother should be recorded as the birth mother on the birth certificate and all decisions involving legal parenthood and parental responsibility should be taken after the birth by a court or other competent authority, with the child's best interest the paramount consideration. This is the recommendation of the UN Special Rapporteur* and has the aim of reducing the risk of the sale and trafficking of children and the exploitation of women and their reproductive capacities.

However, if the 'intended parents' are recorded as parents on the birth certificate, the full form of the certificate should make clear that the birth was the result of a surrogacy arrangement.

* <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/Issues/Children/Pages/Surrogacy.aspx>

Paragraph 10.85

Consultation Question 45.

1.54 We invite consultees' views as to whether the birth registration system in England and Wales requires reform and, if so, which reforms they would like to see.

I do not consider the birth registration system to be in need for reform. I am particularly opposed to changes to allow for the registration of three parents or for anyone other than the birth mother to be recorded as the mother on the original birth certificate. Such proposals could lead to the facilitation of the sale of children and an erosion of mothers' rights and a diluting of the understanding that the relationship between the birth mother and the child is unique.

Paragraph 10.87

Consultation Question 46.

1.55 We provisionally propose that, in England and Wales, from the age of 18, a child who has been the subject of a parental order should be able to access all the documents contained in the court's file for those parental order proceedings.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Paragraph 10.89

Consultation Question 47.

1.56 We provisionally propose that a national register of surrogacy arrangements should be created to record the identity of the intended parents, the surrogate and the gamete donors.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.57 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the register should be maintained by the Authority;
- (2) the register should record information for all surrogacy arrangements, whether in or outside the new pathway, provided that the information about who has contributed gametes for the conception of the child has been medically verified, and that the information should include:
 - (a) identifying information about all the parties to the surrogacy arrangement, and
 - (b) non-identifying information about those who have contributed gametes to the conception of the child; and
- (3) to facilitate the record of this information, the application form/petition for a parental order should record full information about a child's genetic heritage where available and established by DNA or medical evidence, recording the use of an anonymous gamete donor if that applies.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and regulated surrogacy organisations. However, should surrogacy take place, it is important that the children have access to information about their origins and these proposals seem generally sound, except that the information held on gamete donors should also include identifying information – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.102

Consultation Question 48.

1.58 We invite consultees' views as to whether non-identifying information about the surrogate and the intended parents should be recorded in the national register of surrogacy arrangements and available for disclosure to a child born of a surrogacy arrangement.

I agree but with the proviso that all the information should be identifying – because otherwise it trivialises the creation of a child and denies the child the right to know her or his genetic parentage.

Paragraph 10.104

Consultation Question 49.

- 1.59 We provisionally propose that a child born of a surrogacy arrangement should be able to access the information recorded in the register from the age of 18 for identifying information, and 16 for non-identifying information (if such information is included on the register), provided that he or she has been given a suitable opportunity to receive counselling about the implications of compliance with this request.

Do consultees agree?

YES

- 1.60 We invite consultees' views as to whether a child under the age of 18 or 16 (depending on whether the information is identifying or non-identifying respectively) should be able to access the information in the register and, if so, in which circumstances:

- (1) where his or her legal parents have consented;
- (2) if he or she has received counselling and the counsellor judges that he or she is sufficiently mature to receive this information; and/or
- (3) in any other circumstances.

I agree with (1) and (2) and believe there might be other circumstances where this is reasonable.

Paragraph 10.110

Consultation Question 50.

- 1.61 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any provision for those born of a surrogacy arrangement to make a request for information to disclose whether a person whom he or she is intending to marry, or with whom he or she intends to enter into a civil partnership or intimate physical relationship, was carried by the same surrogate.

YES, this should be possible.

Paragraph 10.114

Consultation Question 51.

- 1.62 We provisionally propose that where two people are born to, and genetically related through, the same surrogate, they should be able to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

Do consultees agree?

YES

1.63 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be provision to allow people born to the same surrogate – but who are not genetically related – to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so.

YES, I agree.

Paragraph 10.121

Consultation Question 52.

1.64 We invite consultees' views as to whether provision should be made to allow a person carried by a surrogate, and the surrogate's own child, to access the register to identify each other, if they both wish to do so:

- (1) if they are genetically related through the surrogate; and/or
- (2) if they are not genetically related through the surrogate.

YES to both (1) and (2)

Paragraph 10.123

Consultation Question 53.

1.65 For surrogacy arrangements outside the new pathway, we invite consultees' views as to whether details of an intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

The intended parent who is not a party to the application for a parental order should be recorded in the register.

Paragraph 10.128

Consultation Question 54.

1.66 We provisionally propose that the six month time limits in sections 54 and 54A of the HFEA 2008 for making a parental order application should be abolished.

Do consultees agree?

NO

The time limit should be retained but the court should be able to dispense with it in certain circumstances when this is in the best interests of the child.

Paragraph 11.20

Consultation Question 55.

1.67 We provisionally propose that:

- (1) the current circumstances in which the consent of the surrogate (and any other legal parent) is not required, namely where a person cannot be found or is incapable of giving agreement, should continue to be available;

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

- (2) the court should have the power to dispense with the consent of the surrogate, and any other legal parent of the child, in the following circumstances:
 - (a) where the child is living with the intended parents, with the consent of the surrogate and any other legal parent, or
 - (b) following a determination by the court that the child should live with the intended parents; and
- (3) the court's power to dispense with consent should be subject to the paramount consideration of the child's welfare throughout his or her life guided by the factors set out in section 1 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 and, in Scotland, in line with the section 14(3) of the Adoption and Children (Scotland) Act 2007.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I disagree with this because it is a violation of women's rights and would increase the risk of child trafficking and exploitation of the rental of women's wombs. An adoption order can be considered as an option when a parental order is not possible.

Paragraph 11.58

Consultation Question 56.

1.68 We provisionally propose that, both for a parental order and in the new pathway, the intended parents or one of the intended parents must be domiciled or habitually resident in the UK, Channel Islands or Isle of Man.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. The 'intended parents' should be domiciled (and not simply habitually resident) in the UK in order to avoid surrogacy tourism.

1.69 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be any additional conditions imposed on the test of habitual residence, for example, a qualifying period of habitual residence required to satisfy the test.

I profoundly disagree with opening up parental orders to 'intended parents' who are habitual residents but not domiciled in the UK – because of the risk of surrogacy tourism.

Paragraph 12.15

Consultation Question 57.

1.70 We invite consultees' views on whether:

- (1) the qualifying categories of relationship in section 54(2) of the HFEA 2008 should be reformed and, if so, how; or
- (2) the requirement should be removed, subject to two persons who are within the prohibited degrees of relationship being prevented from applying.

The qualifying categories of relationship should not be reformed or removed.

Paragraph 12.29

Consultation Question 58.

- 1.71 We provisionally propose that to use the new pathway, intended parents should be required to make a declaration in the surrogacy agreement that they intend for the child's home to be with them.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 12.34

Consultation Question 59.

- 1.72 We provisionally propose that the new pathway –

- (1) should not impose a requirement that the intended parent, or one of the intended parents, provide gametes for the conception of the child, so that double donation of gametes is permitted, but
- (2) that double donation should only be permitted in cases of medical necessity, meaning that there is not an intended parent who is able to provide a gamete due to infertility.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

- 1.73 We invite consultees' views as to whether double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway (to the same extent that it may be permitted in the new pathway) in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway' and all other proposals that are likely to result in an increase in surrogacy. I therefore do not believe that double donation should be permitted under the parental order pathway in domestic surrogacy arrangements.

- 1.74 We provisionally propose that the requirement that the intended parent or one of the intended parents contribute gametes to the conception of the child in the parental order pathway should be retained in international surrogacy arrangements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

Consultation Question 60.

- 1.75 We provisionally propose that if the requirement for a genetic link is retained for domestic cases outside the new pathway, the requirement should not apply, subject to medical necessity, if the court determines that the intended parents in good faith began the surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway but were required to apply for a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I fundamentally disagree with proposals to introduce the 'new pathway' and believe the genetic link should be retained. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.71

Consultation Question 61.

- 1.76 We provisionally propose that if double donation is permitted only in cases of medical necessity, an exception should be made to allow a parental order to be granted to a single parent without a genetic link where the intended parent's former partner provides gametes but the intended parents' relationship breaks down before the grant of a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.76

Consultation Question 62.

1.77 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that a surrogacy arrangement has been used because of medical necessity:

- (1) for cases under the new pathway to parenthood; and/or
- (2) for cases where a post-birth parental order application is made.

I oppose surrogacy and believe that it is a fundamental violation of women's and children's rights and that it should therefore be banned. I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

1.78 We invite consultees' views as to how a test of medical necessity for surrogacy, if it is introduced, should be defined and assessed.

I dispute that surrogacy is ever a 'medical necessity.'

Paragraph 12.94

Consultation Question 63.

1.79 We provisionally propose that in order to use the new pathway to parenthood, information identifying the child's genetic parents and the surrogate must be provided for entry on the national register of surrogacy agreements prior to registration of the child's birth.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly oppose the introduction of the 'new pathway'. However, I support the requirement in any surrogacy arrangements for the recording of the identity of all genetic parents and the birth mother.

1.80 We invite consultees' views as to whether it should be a condition for an application for a parental order that:

- (1) those who contributed gametes are entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements; and/or
- (2) if it remains a requirement that one of the intended parents provided gametes in the conception of the child, that the genetic link is demonstrated to the court with medical or DNA evidence.

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, I support this condition for a parental order in the circumstances described in both (1) and (2).

1.81 We provisionally propose that it should be a condition for the application of a parental order that the identity of the surrogate is entered on the national register of surrogacy agreements.

Do consultees agree?

YES

While I oppose surrogacy and want to see it banned, if it happens, I support this provision.

Paragraph 12.115

Consultation Question 64.

1.82 We provisionally propose that there should be no maximum age limit for the grant of a parental order. The age of the intended parents should continue to be taken into account in the assessment of the welfare of the child in applications to grant a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am opposed to surrogacy and would like to see it banned, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood. Surrogacy is therefore particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. If surrogacy is to be opened up, a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is imperative. This will make it clear that society does not condone older people entering a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that older people will go ahead with such an arrangement and present the court with a fait accompli.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age but not beyond. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.83 We invite consultees' views as to whether under the new pathway there should be a maximum age limit for intended parents, and if so, what it should be.

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' and it should be 45.

Raising children is demanding and requires vital parents who are engaged with life and society and who can reasonably be expected to survive in good health until the child reaches adulthood.

I am opposed to surrogacy per se, because it is a violation of both women's and children's human rights. However, it is particularly unethical when the 'intended parents' are old. I therefore consider that a maximum age limit for 'intended parents' is important. This will make it clear that society does not consider it acceptable for older people to enter into a surrogacy arrangement and will make it less likely that they will.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement up to that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully.

1.84 We provisionally propose that intended parents should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time that they enter into a surrogacy agreement under the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'. However, if surrogacy is to be allowed, there should be a minimum age for 'intended parents' and it should be much older than 18. I suggest that 25 would be more appropriate.

Any age limits in the legislation will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning entering a surrogacy arrangement at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year olds to believe that it would be reasonable for them to become 'parents' through a surrogacy arrangement – before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

Paragraph 12.133

Consultation Question 65.

1.85 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years of age (at the time of conception), in order for the court to have the power to make a parental order.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I am opposed to surrogacy per se and would like to see it banned, because I consider it a violation of both women's and children's human rights.

At 18 a woman is barely out of childhood and has not yet had an opportunity to establish herself as an adult. This means that she is particularly vulnerable to coercion and manipulation. There should be a significantly older minimum age for entering into a surrogacy arrangement and I suggest that 25 years would be more appropriate.

Any age limits will have a normative effect – and will inevitably be understood as society sanctioning surrogacy at that age. It is therefore imperative that age limits are set very carefully. What kind of society would want 18-year old girls to believe that entering a surrogacy arrangement is a reasonable thing for them to be doing before they have taken even their first steps into independence and adulthood?

1.86 We provisionally propose that surrogates should be required to be at least 18 years old at the time of entering into the surrogacy agreement within the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

Paragraph 12.144

Consultation Question 66.

1.87 We provisionally propose that medical testing of the surrogate, any partner of the surrogate, and any intended parent providing gametes should be required for the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.88 We invite consultees' views as to whether the types of testing set out in the Code of Practice are feasible for traditional surrogacy arrangements outside a licensed clinic, and if not, which types of testing should be required for such arrangements.

Paragraph 13.16

Consultation Question 67.

1.89 We provisionally propose that, as a condition of being eligible for entry into the new pathway:

- (1) the surrogate, her spouse, civil partner or partner (if any) and the intended parents intending to enter into a surrogacy arrangement in the new pathway should be required to attend counselling with regard to the implications of entering into that arrangement; and
- (2) the implications counselling should be provided by a counsellor who meets the requirements set out in the Code of Practice at paragraphs 2.14 to 2.15.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.44

Consultation Question 68.

1.90 We provisionally propose that, for the new pathway, there should be a requirement that the surrogate and the intended parents should take independent legal advice on the effect of the law and of entering into the agreement before the agreement is signed.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.65

Consultation Question 69.

1.91 We provisionally propose that, as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway:

- (1) an enhanced criminal record certificate should be obtained for intended parents, surrogates and any spouses, civil partners or partners of surrogates;
- (2) the body overseeing the surrogate arrangement should not enable a surrogate arrangement to be proceed under the new pathway where a person screened is unsuitable for having being convicted of, or received a police caution for, any offence appearing on a prescribed list of offences; and
- (3) the body overseeing the surrogacy arrangement may also determine that a person is unsuitable based on the information provided in the enhanced record certificate.

Do consultees agree?

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

1.92 We invite consultees' views as to whether the list of offences that applies in the case of adoption is appropriate in the case of surrogacy arrangements in the new pathway.

OTHER

I profoundly disagree with the proposals for the 'new pathway'.

Paragraph 13.73

Consultation Question 70.

1.93 We invite consultees' views as to whether there should be a requirement that the surrogate has previously given birth as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

OTHER

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women who have never had a child of their own entering an arrangement to undergo pregnancy and childbirth for someone else. It is impossible to understand what pregnancy and childbirth are like and how they will change you until or unless you have had that experience yourself.

Paragraph 13.95

Consultation Question 71.

1.94 We provisionally propose that there should not be a maximum number of surrogate pregnancies that a woman can undertake as an eligibility requirement of the new pathway.

Do consultees agree?

NO

I am profoundly opposed to surrogacy and the introduction of the 'new pathway'.

Society should not condone women undergoing multiple 'surrogate' pregnancies and childbirths. Even the Kennel Club recognises that female dogs should not be allowed to undertake more than four pregnancies. It is abhorrent that female dogs have better protections than women would have under this proposal.

Paragraph 13.99

Consultation Question 72.

1.95 We invite consultees' views as to whether payment of costs by the intended parents to the surrogate should be able to be:

- (1) based on an allowance;
- (2) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, but without the need for production of receipts; or
- (3) based on costs actually incurred by the surrogate, and only on production of receipts.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I strongly wish to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts. To do otherwise is to be explicit in human exploitation.

Paragraph 15.16

Consultation Question 73.

1.96 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate essential costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered "essential".

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.22

Consultation Question 74.

1.97 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay the surrogate additional costs relating to the pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of expenditure which should be considered additional, rather than essential.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above the actual essential costs of the pregnancy and birth – such as medical supplies, extra food and vitamins, and travel to medical appointments – backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.26

Consultation Question 75.

1.98 We invite consultees' views as to:

- (1) whether intended parents should be permitted to pay all costs that arise from entering into a surrogacy arrangement, and those unique to a surrogate pregnancy; and
- (2) the types of cost which should be included within this category.

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests. Currently 14 million people live in poverty in the UK, including 4 million children whose mothers would be most at risk from this law. To exploit their desperation for the personal benefit of the wealthy is nothing short of despicable; especially when alternative methods of poverty relief pursued by the government are clearly woefully inadequate. Having a mother who acts as a surrogate can also provide significant problems for the children in later life (source <https://ifstudies.org/blog/the-overlooked-risks-of-surrogacy-for-women>)

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

Paragraph 15.29

Consultation Question 76.

1.99 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate her actual lost earnings (whether the surrogate is employed or self-employed).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.

I would like to see a total ban on surrogacy in the UK, as there is in Spain. If surrogacy is accepted, however, legislation should allow no payments to the birth mother above actual essential costs, backed up by receipts.

I am therefore opposed to allowing the 'intended parents' to pay the birth mother for lost earnings.

Paragraph 15.37

Consultation Question 77.

1.100 We invite consultees' views as to whether they consider that intended parents should be able to pay their surrogate either or both of the following lost potential earnings:

- (1) her lost employment-related potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.35 above); and/or
- (2) other lost potential earnings (as defined in paragraph 15.36 above).

I am opposed to paid surrogacy because it commercialises women's reproductive functions, commodifies children, and risks the sale of children, against which there is an international prohibition. Surrogacy is therefore a violation of the human rights of both women and children.

There is rising inequality in the UK and any payments above the reimbursement of the most essential and basic expenses will act as an incentive to poor women to engage in surrogacy when it is not in their best interests.
